CAPITAL CASE

REPLY ON QUESTION PRESENTED

The State's reformulation of the question presented avoids the important issues that are properly before this Court. Certiorari should be granted. Even if the decision to deny retroactivity were a state court decision, no state is free to apply state law contrary to equal protection and no state is free to impose and maintain a death sentence in an arbitrary and capricious manner. Florida's capital sentencing structure does violate Caldwell v. Mississippi because the jury, unconstitutionally sitting as an advisory panel, had their role diminished.

REPLY TO BRIEF IN OPPOSITION

THE STATE'S BRIEF IN OPPOSITION DOES NOT OVERCOME MR. SHERE'S ARGUMENTS FOR GRANTING CERTIORARI.

The grounds in Mr. Shere's petition are properly before this Court. This petition reaches this Court as gross injustices remain in Florida's death penalty system that can only be adequately addressed by this Court. Mr. Shere maintains that: The Florida Supreme Court's denial of retroactive relief under Hurst v. Florida, 136 S. Ct. 616 (2016), on the ground that his death sentence became final before June 24, 2002 under the decision in Asay v. State, 210 So. 3d 1 (Fla. 2016), while granting retroactive Hurst relief to inmates whose death sentences had not become final on June 24, 2002 under the decision in Mosley v. State, 209 So. 3d 1248 (Fla. 2016), violated Mr. Shere's right to Equal Protection of the Laws under the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States (e.g., Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U.S. 356 (1886); Skinner v. Oklahoma ex rel. Williamson, 316 U.S. 535 (1942)) and his right against arbitrary infliction of the punishment of death under the Eighth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States (e.g., Godfrey v. Georgia, 446 U.S. 420 (1980); Espinosa v. Florida, 505 U.S. 1079 (1992) (per curiam); Johnson v. Mississippi, 486 U.S. 578, 584-585, 587 (1988)). This Court should grant certiorari.

The State argued a number of points in its Brief in Opposition. These points are countered as follows:

The Florida Supreme Court's decision conflicts with this Court's decision in Hurst v. Florida, and numerous cases decided by this Court that established the requirements for the constitutional imposition of the death penalty.

The State argued "that Shere does not provide any 'compelling' reason for this Court to review his case". BIO at 6. The unconstitutional execution of more than a hundred individuals is sufficiently compelling. The Florida Supreme Court's decision in Mr. Shere's case (and the other pre-Ring<sup>1</sup> cases which relief was denied) conflicts with this Court's decision in Hurst v. Florida and the numerous cases decided by this Court that limit the death penalty to most aggravated and least mitigated, and that death not be arbitrarily or capriciously imposed.

Whether retroactivity is based on state law or federal law, no state is free to apply state law contrary to equal protection and no state is free to impose and maintain a death sentence in an arbitrary and capricious manner.

The State argued that "nothing about the Florida Supreme Court retroactivity decision is inconsistent with the United States Constitution." BIO at 6. Mr. Shere disagrees.

The State is free to allow greater retroactivity than that which is required by the United States Constitution, but not less. See Welch v. United States, 136 S. Ct. 1257, 1264 (2016). ("The normal framework for determining whether a new rule applies to cases on collateral review stems from the plurality opinion in Teague v. Lane, 489 U.S. 288 (1989)). The state is not free to apply its own retroactivity law in a manner that renders the remaining death sentences unconstitutional.

A state is also not free to deny retroactive application of a new law that should be found retroactive under the federal standard of retroactivity. In Montgomery v. Louisiana, 136 S. Ct. 718, 725 (2016), the state courts denied relief under Miller v. Alabama, 567 U.S. 460 (2012), based on a finding of non-retroactivity under state law. Montgomery, 136 S.Ct at 727. On certiorari review, this Court considered whether Miller adopted a new substantive rule that applies retroactively on collateral review and whether the state court could refuse to give retroactive effect to Miller. Id. The Court reversed the state denial based on retroactivity grounds because:

Under the Supremacy Clause of the Constitution, state collateral review courts have no greater power than federal habeas courts to mandate that a prisoner continue to suffer punishment barred by the Constitution. If a state collateral proceeding is open to a claim controlled by federal law, the state court "has a duty to grant the relief that federal law requires." Yates, 484 U.S., at 218, 108 S.Ct. 534. Where state collateral review proceedings permit prisoners to challenge the lawfulness of their confinement, States cannot refuse to give retroactive effect to a substantive constitutional right that determines the outcome of that challenge.

Id. at 731-32. Accordingly, based on Montgomery, a state court may not constitutionally refuse to give retroactive effect to a substantive constitutional right. While Danforth v. Minnesota, 552 U.S. 264 (2008), allows a state court to extend more retroactivity than federal constitutional law requires, a state may not refuse to apply new law retroactively when the new law meets the requirements for federal retroactive application.

The State "cannot refuse to give retroactive effect to a substantive constitutional right that determines the outcome of that challenge." Montgomery, 136 S.Ct at 731-32. In Mr. Shere's case, giving retroactive effect to the post-Ring cases but not to the pre-Ring cases, based on no other distinction than the calendar, violates equal protection and is arbitrary and capricious.

There was no independent and adequate state ground for the State to seek refuge from the Constitution.

The independent and adequate state ground theory does not prevent review of state court decisions that conflict with the United States Constitution. In the instant case it was the so-called state court decision finding that the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments were not violated that was the basis for denying Mr. Shere a remedy.

The State misuses the independent and adequate (and regularly applied) state grounds doctrine. This Court stated in Johnson v. Mississippi, 486 U.S. 578 (1988):

"[W]e have consistently held that the question of when and how defaults in compliance with state procedural rules can preclude our consideration of a federal question is itself a federal question." Henry v. Mississippi, 379 U.S. 443, 447 [85 S.Ct. 564, 567, 13 L.Ed.2d 408] (1965). "[A] state procedural ground is not 'adequate' unless the procedural rule is 'strictly or regularly followed.'" Barr v. City of Columbia, 378 U.S. 146, 149 [84 S.Ct. 1734, 1736, 12 L.Ed.2d 766] (1964)."

Hathorn v. Lovorn, 457 U.S. 255, 262-263, 102 S.Ct. 2421, 2426-2427, 72 L.Ed.2d 824 (1982); see Henry v. Mississippi, 379 U.S., at 447-448, 85 S.Ct., at 567-568. We find no evidence that the procedural bar relied on by the Mississippi Supreme Court here has been consistently or regularly applied.

Id. at 587.

The denial in Mr. Shere's case was not based on an independent and adequate state ground, regularly applied. The Florida Supreme Court did not deny relief because of a procedural bar. Because the Florida Supreme Court did not apply a non-retroactivity bar to the post-Ring cases, this would not be a "regularly applied" independent and adequate state ground. Moreover, considering that the court fabricated partial retroactivity from whole cloth in this case, it was even clearer that the State's reliance on the doctrine is misplaced.

Most importantly, there is a distinction between the state basing some ruling on the state's procedural rules and the state's case law just disagreeing with the federal case law. All state court rulings that claim a state law basis are not immune from this Court's federal constitutional review. A state court ruling is "independent" only when it has a state-law basis for the denial of a federal constitutional claim that is separate from "the merits of the federal claim." Foster v. Chatman, 136 S. Ct. 1737, 1759 (2016); see also Florida v. Powell, 559 U.S. 50, 56-59 (2010); Michigan v. Long, 463 U.S. 1032, 1037-44 (1983). The federal question here is whether the Florida Supreme Court's Ring-based retroactivity cutoff for Hurst claims violates the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments to the United States Constitution. The Florida Supreme Court's application of its state-law Ring-based cutoff to Mr. Shere cannot be "independent" from Mr. Shere's federal Eighth and Fourteenth Amendment claims. The state court's ruling is inseparable from the merits of the federal constitutional arguments.

Under the State's interpretation of the independent and adequate state ground theory, this Court could not have granted certiorari in Hurst itself, given the Florida Supreme Court's upholding of Florida's prior capital sentencing scheme as a matter of state law. According to the State's logic, so long as any state retroactivity scheme is articulated as a matter of state law, this Court is powerless to consider cutoffs drawn at any arbitrary point in time, or even state rules providing retroactivity to defendants of certain races or religions but not others.

Contrary to the State's response, this Court has offered a simple test to determine whether a state ruling rests on independent and adequate state grounds: would this Court's decision on the federal constitutional issue be an advisory opinion, i.e., would the result be that "the same judgment would be rendered by the state court after [this Court] corrected its views of federal laws"? Ake v. Oklahoma, 470 U.S. 68, 74-75 (1985). In the case of the Florida Supreme Court's Hurst retroactivity formula, the answer is "no." If this Court were to hold that the Ring-based cutoff violated the Constitution, the Florida Supreme Court surely could not re-impose its prior judgment denying relief based on the Ring cutoff.

Equal Protection and Arbitrariness and Capriciousness.

The Eighth Amendment requirement of Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972), and Godfrey v. Georgia, 446 U.S. 420 (1980), is that "if a State wishes to authorize capital punishment it has a constitutional responsibility to tailor and apply its law in a manner that avoids the arbitrary and capricious infliction of the death penalty" (id. at 428). This command "insist[s] upon general rules that ensure consistency in determining who receives a death sentence." Kennedy v. Louisiana, 554 U.S. 407, 436 (2008). It refines the older, settled precept that the Equal Protection of the Laws is denied "[w]hen the law lays an unequal hand on those who have committed intrinsically the same quality of offense and . . . [subjects] one and not the other" to a uniquely harsh form of punishment. Skinner v. Oklahoma ex rel. Williamson, 316 U.S. 535, 541 (1942). See, e.g., Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U.S. 356 (1886). The Florida Supreme Court's Ring-split dividing line violates these holdings of this Court.

McCleskey v. Kemp, (1987), stands for the proposition that a petitioner needs to show actual, purposeful discrimination for a de facto equal protection claim. Mr. Shere's case is different. In the instant case, there is no need to extrapolate from data, the Florida Supreme Court actually and purposely discriminated between those whose sentences were unfortunate enough to come before Ring. As stated in McCleskey, there is "a second principle inherent in the Eighth Amendment, 'that punishment for crime should be graduated and proportioned to offense.'" McCleskey, 481 U.S. at 300, citing Weems v. United States, 217 U.S. 349, 378 (1910). When compared to the more aggravated, and less mitigated, cases that will receive new sentencings that result in life, simply because of the date their case became final, Mr. Shere's death sentence is no longer "graduated and proportioned to [the] offense." Id.

Rather than defeat Mr. Shere's claim, McCleskey strengthens it. In denying relief to McCleskey, this Court stated: "On the other hand, absent a showing that the Georgia capital punishment system operates in an arbitrary and capricious manner, McCleskey cannot prove a constitutional violation by demonstrating that other defendants who may be similarly situated did not receive the death penalty." Id. at 306-07. Mr. Shere has made exactly the showing that this Court required to prove a constitutional violation in McCleskey. The decision maker in Mr. Shere's case, the Florida Supreme Court, acted with discriminatory purpose because it denied relief based on the effect of maintaining the pre-Ring individual's death sentences. Id. at 297-98. Mr. Shere has showed that the Florida Supreme Court's decisions were arbitrary and capricious.

This Court also made clear in McCleskey:

In sum, our decisions since Furman have identified a constitutionally permissible range of discretion in imposing the death penalty. First, there is a required threshold below which the death penalty cannot be imposed. In this context, the State must establish rational criteria that narrow the decisionmaker's judgment as to whether the circumstances of a particular defendant's case meet the threshold.

Id. at 305-06. The Florida Supreme Court actually discriminated by picking one side to give relief and one side to not give relief based on no reason attributable to the nature of the case, or the character of the person. Mr. Shere's case fell below the threshold for death before Hurst. After Hurst, in comparison, this is even more so because the marginal cases like Mr. Shere's will not receive death, either by prosecutorial acquiescence or because the standards are much higher now in Florida in post-Hurst penalty phase trials.

The Jury Instructions in Mr. Shere's case did violate Caldwell v. Mississippi when considered in light of Hurst v. Florida and Hurst v. State.

Florida's capital sentencing structure does violate Caldwell v. Mississippi, 472 U.S. 320 (1985), because the jury instructions to the advisory panel, diminished the advisory panel's role, even though they were not sitting as a jury. Hurst brought to light that Florida was denying individuals the right to a jury trial. The Caldwell issue Mr. Shere raised does not create any additional retroactivity problems; it can stand alone or be considered for the point that the Florida Supreme Court left behind the death sentences of those who were even further removed from a constitutional death sentence. Mr. Shere with a mere 7-5 death advisory panel shows that he was not the most aggravated and least mitigated, then or now, when compared those who will receive death.

CONCLUSION

Certiorari should be granted.
