ARGUMENT

I. Johnson's petition raises a federal question.

Despite recognizing that Johnson's petition for writ of certiorari raises questions under Strickland v. Washington, 466 U.S. 668 (1984)—a case of this Court construing the federal Constitution—the State's heading claims that the petition does not raise a federal question. It does. See Pet. at 9 (citing Strickland and progeny); id. at 10 (arguing that the Nevada Supreme Court's decision “signals the constitutional rule in Strickland is optional”).

Heading notwithstanding, the State's argument appears to be that the Nevada Supreme Court's “discretionary” standard is consistent with Strickland's recognition that “there are countless ways to provide effective assistance in any given case.” Br. in Opp. at 2 (quoting Strickland, 466 U.S. at 689). But the State overstates the meaning of this language from Strickland. Strickland was explicit that only “strategic choices made after thorough investigation of law and facts” “are virtually unchallengeable.” Strickland, 466 U.S. at 690. “[C]ounsel has a duty to make reasonable investigations or to make a reasonable decision that makes particular investigations unnecessary.” Id. at 691.

The issue in this case is that trial counsel did not make a reasonable choice to not investigate coerced confessions or a corresponding reasonable choice not to present a coerced confession expert. Treating the “decision not to call a witness at trial” as being “within counsel's discretion,” without regard to whether counsel investigated or even made a choice at all, is contrary to Strickland. See App. 8.

The State also argues that the Nevada Supreme Court appropriately concluded there was no prejudice. See Br. in Opp. at 3. But the witnesses whose testimony was implicated were crucial to the State’s case, particularly testimony that Johnson confessed to these homicides. Notably, both the Nevada Supreme Court and the State rely on “physical evidence” that corroborates the testimony. App. 9; Br. in Opp. at 3. But neither identify what the physical evidence is, and neither acknowledge that Johnson challenged the physical evidence that was available. See App. 9–10, 12.

Thus, the State is three times wrong: Johnson’s petition raises a federal question; there cannot be a discretionary decision where counsel failed to conduct a reasonable investigation or make any strategic choice whatsoever; and counsel’s deficient performance was prejudicial because the coerced statements of the witnesses were crucial to the State’s case.
