PARTIES TO THE PROCEEDING

Applicant Scott Ogle, a defendant in criminal proceedings in Texas state court, filed a pretrial application for a writ of habeas corpus in the Hays County Court at Law, which the court denied. He was then the appellant before the Third Court of Appeals of Texas and the appellant-petitioner before the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals, the court of last resort for all criminal matters in Texas.

The State of Texas was the appellee in the Third Court of Appeals and the appellee-respondent before the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals.

APPLICATION FOR FURTHER EXTENSION OF TIME TO FILE
A PETITION FOR A WRIT OF CERTIORARI
TO THE THIRD COURT OF APPEALS OF TEXAS

---

To the Honorable Samuel Alito, Associate Justice of the United States Supreme Court and Circuit Justice for the Fifth Circuit:

Pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 2101(c) and Rules 13.5, 22, and 30.3 of the Rules of this Court, applicant Scott Ogle respectfully requests an additional 29-day extension of time, to and including Friday, March 8, 2019, within which to file a petition for a writ of certiorari to review the judgment of the Third Court of Appeals of Texas in this case. The Texas Court of Criminal Appeals refused Mr. Ogle's petition for discretionary review of the judgment of the Third Court of Appeals on October 10, 2018 (see Ex. A (order) & Ex. B (Keller, P.J., dissenting from refusal to grant the petition)). On December 27, 2018, Justice Alito extended the deadline to file a petition for a writ of certiorari from January 8, 2019, to February 7, 2019 (see Ex. C). This second application is therefore made at least 10 days before the petition is due. This Court’s jurisdiction would be invoked under 28 U.S.C. § 1254(1).

1. This case presents an important question concerning the constitutionality under the First Amendment of state statutes that criminalize allegedly harassing or annoying electronic communications. The relevant Texas statute criminalizes speech that a number of other States’ highest courts have held is protected by the First Amendment, thus creating a split on the issue.

2. Petitioner Scott Ogle sent two public servants electronic communications that criticized their job performance as police officers. The State of Texas charged petitioner with violating the State’s electronic-communication harassment statute, which prohibits a person from “send[ing] repeated electronic communications in a manner reasonably likely to harass, annoy, alarm, abuse, torment, embarrass, or offend another” with the “intent to harass, annoy, alarm, abuse, torment, or embarrass” the recipient. TEX. PENAL CODE § 42.07(a)(7).

3. Petitioner filed a pretrial application for a writ of habeas corpus in the Hays County Court at Law, arguing that section 42.07(a)(7) is facially unconstitutional. Ex parte Ogle, 03-18-00207-CR, 2018 WL 3637385, at *1

(Tex. App.—Austin Aug. 1, 2018, pet. ref'd) (see Ex. D). The court denied the application, and petitioner appealed.

4. Petitioner presented the “single issue on appeal” that the statute is “facially overbroad under the First Amendment to the United States Constitution.” Id. at *3. The Third Court of Appeals held, however, that the statute is not overbroad and does not restrict protected speech because it is “directed at people repeatedly using electronic communication to invade the personal privacy of another with the intent to inflict emotional distress.” Id. at *2-4 (relying on the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals’s opinion in Scott v. Texas, 322 S.W.3d 662, 670 (Tex. Crim. App. 2010), which upheld a distinct, telephonic-communication subsection of section 42.07 based on an invasion-of-privacy rationale). Consequently, the Third Court of Appeals affirmed the denial of petitioner’s habeas application.

5. Petitioner sought review of the Third Court of Appeals’s judgment in the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals. That Court refused the petition over the dissent of Presiding Judge Keller, who stated that “the information in this case appears to implicate core speech under the First Amendment—criticism of the government” and that the breadth of the statute could be “characterized as ‘breathtaking.’” Ogle v. State, No. PD-0846-18, slip op. at 1-2 (Keller, P.J., dissenting from refusal to grant petition) (Ex. B). Presiding Judge Keller cited her previous dissent from an earlier refusal to grant a petition challenging the constitutionality of the very same statute, noting that “[n]ow we have a case in which the electronic communications harassment statute has been invoked to punish communications made to police officers. If this Court believed that the prosecuting authorities would never use this statute to punish criticism of agents of the government, it ought to now recognize that such a belief was overly optimistic.” Id. at 2 (citing Ex Parte Reece, 517 S.W.3d 108, 110 (Tex. Crim. App. 2017) (Keller, P.J., dissenting from refusal of petition)). “Given the breadth of the electronic-communications harassment statute,[<sup>1</sup>] and the potential to use it to suppress criticism of the government,” Presiding Judge Keller contended, the Court should “address whether the statute is facially unconstitutional in violation of the First Amendment.” Id. at 2.

6. The further 29-day extension is necessary because, despite working diligently since the first extension, undersigned counsel has not had sufficient time to confer adequately with the client and to prepare the petition and appendix in light of the multiple jury trials and other commitments set out in the first application. Counsel requests an additional

<sup>1</sup> As Presiding Judge Keller observed in her previous dissent from the refusal of the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals to address this issue, the scope of electronic communications encompassed by section 42.07(a)(7) “is not limited to emails, instant messages, or pager calls. It also applies, for example, to [F]acebook posts, message-board posts, blog posts, blog comments, and newspaper article comments.” Ex parte Reece, 517 S.W.3d at 111 (Keller, P.J., dissenting from refusal of petition).

29 days to ensure that the petition will thoroughly present the important First Amendment question at issue in this case.

In the interest of fairness, counsel has no objection if respondent receives additional time to respond to the petition.

Accordingly, applicant Scott Ogle respectfully requests that the time within which to file a petition for a writ of certiorari be extended for 29 days, to and including March 8, 2019.

Respectfully submitted,

KELLER, P.J., filed a dissenting opinion.

Appellant has been charged with two counts of the offense of sending harassing electronic communications. The alleged victims in this case are police officers. According to the information, Appellant made “repeated phone calls, calls for service, emails, and or subpoenas many of which contained offensive or disparaging language” with “intent to harass, annoy, alarm, abuse, torment, or embarrass” the officers.<sup>1</sup> The information in this case appears to implicate core speech under the First Amendment—criticism of the government.

OGLE DISSENT — 2

I have previously dissented to the refusal to grant discretionary review of a First Amendment facial challenge to the electronic-communications harassment statute.<sup>2</sup> I pointed out that the breadth of the statute, applying to all electronic communications, could accurately be characterized as “breathtaking.”<sup>3</sup> All that is required are two electronic communications that are intended and reasonably likely to annoy, alarm, or harass a particular person.<sup>4</sup> In a prior case, involving a narrower but somewhat similar telephone harassment statute, I warned that, because the statute was not limited to phone calls made to someone’s home or personal phone, the statute could encompass a “call made to a public official at his government office.”<sup>5</sup>

Now we have a case in which the electronic-communications harassment statute has been invoked to punish communications made to police officers.<sup>6</sup> If this Court believed that the prosecuting authorities would never use this statute to punish criticism of agents of the government, it ought to now recognize that such a belief was overly optimistic. Given the breadth of the electronic-communications harassment statute, and the potential to use it to suppress criticism of the government, we should grant review to address whether the statute is facially unconstitutional in violation of the First Amendment. Because the Court does not, I respectfully dissent.

Mr. Mark W. Bennett, Bennett & Bennett, 917 Franklin Street, Fourth Floor, Houston, TX 77002, for Appellant.

Before Justices Puryear, Pemberton, and Bourland

MEMORANDUM OPINION

David Puryear, Justice

*1 In two separate charging instruments, Scott Ogle was alleged to have sent “repeated electronic communications to” two police officers; to have sent those communications “with intent to harass, annoy, alarm, abuse, torment or embarrass” the police officers; and to have sent those communications “in a manner reasonably likely to harass, annoy, alarm, abuse, torment, embarrass, or offend another, to-wit: repeated phone calls, calls for service, and/or emails many of which contained offensive or disparaging language.” See Tex. Penal Code § 42.07(a)(7). After being charged, Ogle filed an application for writ of habeas corpus urging that the charges against him should be dismissed because the Penal Code provision serving as the basis for his charges is, according to him, facially unconstitutional. See id. § 42.07(c) (stating that offense is misdemeanor); Tex. Code Crim. Proc. art. 11.09 (setting out procedure for filing application for writ of habeas corpus for individuals charged with misdemeanor offenses). After convening a hearing, the county court at law denied the writ application. Ogle appeals the ruling by the county court at law. We will affirm the order by the county court at law denying Ogle’s application for writ of habeas corpus.

STANDARD OF REVIEW AND GOVERNING LAW

As mentioned above, Ogle sought to challenge the constitutionality of a statute through a pretrial habeas application. “[P]retrial habeas, followed by an interlocutory appeal, is an ‘extraordinary remedy,’ and ‘appellate courts have been careful to ensure that a pretrial writ is not misused to secure pretrial appellate review of matters that in actual fact should not be put before appellate courts at the pretrial stage.’ ” Ex parte Ellis, 309 S.W.3d 71, 79 (Tex. Crim. App. 2010) (quoting Ex parte Doster, 303 S.W.3d 720, 724 (Tex. Crim. App. 2010) ). “Pretrial habeas can be used to bring a facial challenge to the constitutionality of the statute that defines the offense but may not be used to advance an ‘as applied’ challenge.” Id. A determination regarding whether a statute is facially unconstitutional is a question of law subject to de novo review. Ex parte Lo, 424 S.W.3d 10, 14 (Tex. Crim. App. 2013). A facial challenge is essentially “a claim that ‘the statute, by its terms, always operates unconstitutionally.’ ” Lebo v. State, 474 S.W.3d 402, 405 (Tex. App.—San Antonio 2015, pet. ref’d) (quoting Gillenwaters v. State, 205 S.W.3d 534, 536 n. 2 (Tex. Crim. App. 2006)). When assessing a statute’s constitutionality, reviewing courts “presume that the statute is valid and that the legislature has not acted unreasonably or arbitrarily” when enacting the statute. Rodriguez

v. State, 93 S.W.3d 60, 69 (Tex. Crim. App. 2002). Moreover, the party presenting the statutory challenge has the burden of establishing that the statute is unconstitutional. Id.

“The First Amendment overbreadth doctrine holds that a statute is facially invalid if, as written, it sweeps within its coverage a ‘substantial’ amount of First Amendment-protected expression as compared to any activity it proscribes constitutionally.” Ex parte Perry, 471 S.W.3d 63, 88 (Tex. App.—Austin 2015) (quoting Ex parte Lo, 424 S.W.3d at 18), rev'd in part on other grounds, 483 S.W.3d 884 (Tex. Crim. App. 2016). “[T]he overbreadth doctrine allows a statute to be invalidated on its face even if it has legitimate application, and even if the parties before the court have suffered no constitutional violation.” Ex parte Ellis, 309 S.W.3d at 91. “The overbreadth doctrine is ‘strong medicine’ that should be employed ‘sparingly’ and ‘only as a last resort.’” Id. (quoting Broadrick v. Oklahoma, 413 U.S. 601, 613 (1973)). “[T]he overbreadth of a statute must not only be real, but substantial as well, judged in relation to the statute’s plainly legitimate sweep.” Id. (quoting Broadrick, 413 U.S. at 615).

STATUTORY FRAMEWORK

*2 The provision of the Penal Code at issue in this case is section 42.07. That provision provides, in relevant part, as follows:

(a) A person commits an offense if, with intent to harass, annoy, alarm, abuse, torment, or embarrass another, the person ...

(4) causes the telephone of another to ring repeatedly or makes repeated telephone communications anonymously or in a manner reasonably likely to harass, annoy, alarm, abuse, torment, embarrass, or offend another;

... or

(7) sends repeated electronic communications in a manner reasonably likely to harass, annoy, alarm, abuse, torment, embarrass, or offend another.

Tex. Penal Code § 42.07(a)(4), (7); see also id. § 42.07(b)(1) (defining “[e]lectronic communication”).

Previously, the court of criminal appeals addressed the constitutionality of subsection 42.07(a)(4). See Scott v. State, 322 S.W.3d 662 (Tex. Crim. App. 2010), abrogated on other grounds by Wilson v. State, 448 S.W.3d 418 (Tex. Crim. App. 2014). Specifically, the court was asked to address whether subsection 42.07(a)(4) implicated the free-speech guarantee of the First Amendment when confronted with a vagueness and an overbreadth challenge to the statute. Id. at 667-69. Although the court noted that the Free Speech Clause “generally protects the free communication and receipt of ideas, opinions, and information,” it also explained that “[t]he State may lawfully proscribe communicative conduct (i.e., the communication of ideas, opinions, and information) that invades the substantial privacy interests of another in an essentially intolerable manner.” Id. at 668-69. Further, the court observed that the plain language of the statute required an individual to have the specific intent “to inflict harm on the victim in the form of one of the listed types of emotional distress” and that the statute required the individual to repeatedly make phone calls to the alleged victim in a manner that was “reasonably likely to,” consistent with the language of the statute, “harass, annoy, alarm, abuse, torment, embarrass, or offend an average person.” Id. at 669.

In light of the preceding, the court concluded that the provision does not implicate the free-speech guarantee afforded by the First Amendment because the statute “is directed only at persons who, with the specific intent to inflict emotional distress, repeatedly use the telephone to invade another’s privacy and do so in a manner reasonably likely to inflict emotional distress,” meaning that “the conduct to which the statutory subsection is susceptible of application will be, in the usual case, essentially noncommunicative, even if the conduct includes spoken words.” Id. at 669-70. In other words, the court explained that, “in the usual case, persons whose conduct violates § 42.07(a)(4) will not have an intent to engage in the legitimate communication of ideas, opinions, or information; they will have only the intent to inflict emotional distress for its own sake.” Id. at 670. Further, the court reasoned that “[t]o the extent that the statutory subsection is susceptible of application to communicative conduct, it is susceptible of such application only when that communicative conduct is not covered by the First Amendment because, under the circumstances presented, that communicative conduct invades the substantial privacy interests of another (the victim) in an essentially intolerable manner.” Id.

*3 Following that ruling by the court of criminal appeals, this Court was presented with a similar set of arguments regarding subsection 42.07(a)(7), which is the provision at issue in this case. See Blanchard v. State, No. 03-16-00014-CR, 2016 WL 3144142 (Tex. App.—Austin June 2, 2016, pet. ref'd) (mem. op., not designated for publication). In Blanchard, this Court explained that “[t]he free-speech analysis in Scott is equally applicable to subsection 42.07(a)(7).” Id. at *3. Although this Court noted that there is a slight difference in the language in subsections 42.07(a)(4) and 42.07(a)(7) in that subsection 42.07(a)(4) “provides an alternative manner of committing the offense by making repeated phone calls ‘anonymously,’ ” this Court reasoned that the slight “textual difference is inconsequential to the First Amendment analysis” and noted that the remaining statutory language in the two subsections “is identical.” Id. (quoting Tex. Penal Code § 42.07(a)(4)).

Further, this Court observed that “[e]ach of the subsections in section 42.07 has the same subjective intent requirement that the actor engage in the particular form of communicative conduct with the specific intent to” harm the victims by inflicting one of the types of emotional distress listed in the statute. Id. For that reason, this Court reasoned that “an actor who violates subsection 42.07(a)(7) has no more an intent to engage in legitimate communication of ideas, opinions, or information than an actor whose telephone calls violate subsection 42.07(a)(4)” and that “[r]epeated electronic communications made with the specific intent to inflict one of the designated types of emotional distress ‘for its own sake’ invade the substantial privacy interests of the victim in ‘an essentially intolerable manner.’ ” Id. (quoting Scott, 322 S.W.3d at 670). Accordingly, this Court concluded that those types of communications “are not the type of legitimate communication that is protected by the First Amendment,” that they “do not implicate speech protected by the First Amendment,” and that the individual seeking habeas relief “failed to establish that, on its face, section 42.07(a)(7) violates the constitution by being overbroad or unduly vague.” Id. at *3-4.

In addition to this Court, several of our sister courts of appeals have reached the same conclusion regarding the constitutionality of subsection 42.07(a)(7) following the decision in Scott. See Ex parte Reece, No. 11-16-00196-CR, 2016 WL 6998930, at *3 (Tex. App.—Eastland Nov. 30, 2016, pet. ref'd) (mem. op., not designated for publication) (determining that vagueness challenge and overbreadth claim failed because “the electronic communications proscribed by subsection (a)(7) do not implicate protected speech under the First Amendment”); Lebo, 474 S.W.3d at 408 (concluding “that the electronic communications proscribed by subsection (a)(7) do not implicate protected speech under the First Amendment” and that defendant “failed to establish that section 42.07(a)(7) violates the constitution by being overbroad or unduly vague”); Duran v. State, Nos. 13-11-00205-CR, -00218-CR, 2012 WL 3612507, at *3-4 (Tex. App.—Corpus Christi Aug. 23, 2012, pet. ref'd) (mem. op., not designated for publication) (rejecting argument that subsection 42.07(a)(7) was facially vague and overbroad and deciding that subsection “42.07(a)(7) does not implicate the free-speech guarantee of the First Amendment” and “does not encompass a substantial amount of expressive activity that is protected by the First Amendment”).

DISCUSSION

In a single issue on appeal, Ogle asserts that “section 42.07(a)(7) is facially overbroad under the First Amendment to the United States Constitution.” When presenting this issue on appeal, Ogle acknowledges the analysis from Scott but does not address this Court’s Blanchard opinion applying the analysis from Scott when deciding that the limitations imposed by subsection 42.07(a)(7) did not implicate speech protected by the First Amendment. When asserting that the analysis from Scott should not govern the outcome of this case, Ogle argues that subsection 42.07(a)(7) is overbroad because it restricts noncommercial speech based on its content.

*4 As support for his assertion that subsection 42.07(a)(7) is facially unconstitutional, Ogle points to various opinions issued by the Supreme Court that Ogle contends undermine the decision in Scott. Further, Ogle asserts that several of those cases were not issued until after the court of criminal appeals decided Scott and that, therefore, the court of criminal appeals did not have the benefit of the guidance offered by those cases when it decided Scott.

For example, Ogle refers to Reed v. Town of Gilbert, Arizona, in which the Supreme Court explained as follows:

Government regulation of speech is content based if a law applies to particular speech because of the topic discussed or the idea or message expressed. This commonsense meaning of the phrase “content based” requires a court to consider whether a regulation of speech “on its face” draws distinctions based on the message a speaker conveys. Some facial distinctions based on a message are obvious, defining regulated speech by particular subject matter, and others are more subtle, defining regulated speech by its function or purpose. Both are distinctions drawn based on the message a speaker conveys, and, therefore, are subject to strict scrutiny.

135 S.Ct. 2218, 2227 (2015) (internal citations omitted). In light of the portion of the analysis quoted above, Ogle contends that subsection 42.07(a)(7) “defines the regulated speech by its function (‘reasonably likely to harass, annoy, alarm, abuse, torment, embarrass, or offend another’) and its purpose (‘intent to harass, annoy, alarm, abuse, torment, or embarrass another’).”

Similarly, Ogle refers to United States v. Stevens in which the Supreme Court stated as follows:

“From 1791 to the present,” however, the First Amendment has “permitted restrictions upon the content of speech in a few limited areas,” and has never “include[d] a freedom to disregard these traditional limitations.” These “historic and traditional categories long familiar to the bar[ ]”—including obscenity, defamation, fraud, incitement, and speech integral to criminal conduct[ ]—are “well-defined and narrowly limited classes of speech, the prevention and punishment of which have never been thought to raise any Constitutional problem.”

559 U.S. 460, 468-69 (2010) (internal citations omitted). In addition, Ogle points to United States v. Alvarez, where the Supreme Court noted as follows:

[C]ontent-based restrictions on speech have been permitted, as a general matter, only when confined to the few “ ‘historic and traditional categories [of expression] long familiar to the bar.’ ” Among these categories are advocacy intended, and likely, to incite imminent lawless action, obscenity, defamation, speech integral to criminal conduct, so-called “fighting words,” child pornography, fraud, true threats, and speech presenting some grave and imminent threat the government has the power to prevent, although a restriction under the last category is most difficult to sustain. These categories have a historical foundation in the Court’s free speech tradition.

567 U.S. 709, 717-18 (2012) (plurality op.) (internal citations removed).

In light of the language from Stevens and Alvarez, Ogle contends that “[t]he speech restricted by section 42.07(a)(7) falls into none of the recognized unprotected categories, and so is protected” by the First Amendment. See Stevens, 559 U.S. at 472 (explaining that its case law should not be construed as establishing “freewheeling authority to declare new categories of speech outside the scope of the First Amendment” but recognizing that there could be “some categories of speech that have been historically unprotected, but have not yet been specifically identified or discussed as such”).

*5 As an initial matter, we note that none of the statutes at issue in the cases mentioned above involved the type of intentionally harassing conduct prohibited by subsection 42.07(a)(7). See Tex. Penal Code § 42.07(a)(7); see also Reed, 135 S.Ct. at 2224-25 (deciding that sign ordinances “are content-based regulations that cannot survive strict scrutiny”); Alvarez, 567 U.S. at 715-16, 722, 730 (evaluating statute criminalizing lying about being awarded Congressional Medal of Honor, noting that government had “not demonstrated that false statements generally should constitute a new category of unprotected speech,” and concluding that statute “infringes upon speech protected by the First Amendment”); Stevens, 559 U.S. at 464, 472, 482 (addressing statute criminalizing “the commercial creation, sale, or possession of certain depictions of animal cruelty,” concluding that “depictions of animal cruelty” is not category of speech “outside the scope of the First Amendment,” and deciding that statute was “substantially overbroad”).

Additionally, rather than drawing a distinction based on the subject matter or content of a message, subsection 42.07(a)(7) seems to instead draw a distinction based on the manner in which a message is conveyed to the recipient. Further, although Ogle attempts to frame the proscriptions found in subsection 42.07(a)(7) as bearing on the function and purpose of a message, Ogle has not referred to any cases standing for the proposition that narrow restrictions on repeated and intentionally harassing conduct constitute a facial distinction defining speech by its purpose or function. Cf. Webb v. Schlagal, 530 S.W.3d 793, 805 (Tex. App.—Eastland 2017, pet. denied) (reasoning that “[t]o the extent that ... e-mails and online posts constituted stalking or” threats, “they were not protected speech under the First Amendment” and noting that “[c]ourts have made distinctions between communication and harassment; the difference is one between free speech and conduct that may be proscribed”).

Moreover, nothing in the language of the Supreme Court opinions persuades us that this Court could or should ignore the analysis from Scott in which the court of criminal appeals noted the State may “proscribe communicative conduct ... that invades the substantial privacy interests of another in an essentially intolerable manner” and concluded that the subsection 42.07(a)(4) did not implicate the free-speech guarantee afforded by the First Amendment because the statute only applies to individuals who have “the specific intent to inflict emotional distress” by repeatedly making phone calls “to invade another’s privacy ... in a manner reasonably likely to inflict emotional distress” and, accordingly, because the statute applies to conduct that is “essentially noncommunicative, even if the conduct includes spoken words.” 322 S.W.3d at 668-70; see also Cohen v. California, 403 U.S. 15, 21 (1971) (explaining that government may “shut off discourse solely to protect others from hearing it” when “privacy interests are being invaded in an essentially intolerable manner”). As set out above, this Court has previously determined that the analysis from Scott applies with equal force to subsection 42.07(a)(7). See Blanchard, 2016 WL 3144142, at *3.

Additionally, although Ogle posits that the decision in Scott would have been different had it been decided after the release of the more recent opinions by the Supreme Court discussed above, we note that after the Supreme Court decided those cases, the court of criminal appeals handed down an opinion specifically endorsing its analysis from Scott. See Wagner v. State, 539 S.W.3d 298, 311 (Tex. Crim. App. 2018). When addressing a Penal Code provision allowing prosecutions for intentionally or knowingly communicating in a “threatening or harassing manner” with another in violation of a protective order, see Tex. Penal Code § 25.07(a)(2)(A), the court of criminal appeals determined that the statute did not implicate any constitutionally protected speech, summarized its analysis from Scott, and concluded that their “reasoning from that case leads us to conclude that appellant’s overbreadth challenge should be rejected.” See Wagner, 539 S.W.3d at 301, 311.

*6 In his final set of arguments, Ogle urges that subsection 42.07(a)(7) is broader than the provision considered in Scott and, therefore, contends that the analysis from Scott does not control. As support for this, Ogle points to a dissenting opinion issued by the court of criminal appeals after Scott. As set out previously, one of our sister courts of appeals, like this Court, overruled a challenge asserting that subsection 42.07(a)(7) was overbroad and relied on the analysis from Scott as support for that conclusion. See Ex parte Reece, 2016 WL 6998930, at *3. The court of criminal appeals refused to grant the petition for discretionary review filed in that case, and a dissenting opinion to that decision was issued stating that “the electronic communications provision is much broader than the provision at issue in Scott.” See Ex parte Reece, 517 S.W.3d 108, 109 (Tex. Crim. App. 2017) (Keller, J., dissenting).

Specifically, the dissent contended that the subsection addressed in Scott, subsection 42.07(a)(4), “was ‘directed only at persons who, with the specific intent to inflict emotional distress, repeatedly use the telephone to invade another person’s personal privacy’ ” but argued that, in contrast, subsection 42.07(a)(7) purportedly “sweeps within its reach any electronic communication, regardless of whether that communication is directed at a particular person or infringes on the person’s privacy.” Id. (quoting Scott, 322 S.W.3d at 669). As support for its argument, the dissent noted that subsection 42.07(a)(7) applies to “electronic communications” and sets out certain examples of what qualified as an electronic communication. See id. The statutory definition at that time listed the following specific examples of what qualified as an “electronic communication”: “a communication initiated by electronic mail, instant message, network call, or facsimile machine” and “a communication made to a pager.”<sup>1</sup> See Act of May 26, 2001, 77th Leg., R.S., ch. 1222, § 1, sec. 42.07(b)(1), 2001 Tex. Gen. Laws 2795, 2795 (amended 2013, 2017) (current version at Tex. Penal Code § 42.07(b)(1)). Although the dissent recognized that the specific examples of electronic communications listed in the statute, like the conduct at issue “in Scott, ... are directed at a particular person and arguably infringe on that person’s privacy,” the dissent suggested that the use of the word “includes” in the definition “sweeps more broadly than the enumerated examples,” potentially rendering the provision unconstitutional. Ex parte Reece, 517 S.W.3d at 109-10.

<sup>1</sup> After the court of criminal appeals denied the petition for review, the legislature amended subsection 42.07(b)(1) to include additional modes of communication within the definition of electronic communication. See Act of May 27, 2017, 85th Leg., R.S., ch. 522, § 13, sec. 42.07(b)(1), 2017 Tex. Gen. Laws (current version at Tex. Penal Code § 42.07(b)(1)).

Even though the dissent in Ex parte Reece proposed an interesting construction of section 42.07, that construction was not adopted by a majority of the court. Accordingly, there has been no binding decision declaring subsection 42.07(a)(7) or, for that matter, subsection 42.07(a)(4) unconstitutionally overbroad. See McKinney v. State, 177 S.W.3d 186, 205 n.15 (Tex. App.—Houston [1st Dist.] 2005) (recognizing that dissent is not binding precedent), aff’d, 207 S.W.3d 366 (Tex. Crim. App. 2006). On the contrary, this Court and several other intermediate appellate courts have specifically found that subsection 42.07(a)(7) is not unconstitutionally overbroad. See Ex parte Reece, 2016 WL 6998930, at *3; Blanchard, 2016 WL 3144142, at *3-4; Lebo, 474 S.W.3d at 408; Duran, 2012 WL 3612507, at *3-4.

Moreover, although the dissent referred to Scott’s characterization of subsection 42.07(a)(4) as being directed at people repeatedly using a telephone to invade the personal privacy of another with the intent to inflict emotional distress, see Ex parte Reece, 517 S.W.3d at 109, the actual language of subsection 42.07(a)(4) provides that “[a] person commits an offense if, with intent to harass, annoy, alarm, abuse, torment, or embarrass another, the person ... causes the telephone of another to ring repeatedly or makes repeated telephone communications anonymously or in a manner reasonably likely to harass, annoy, alarm, abuse, torment, embarrass, or offend another.” Tex. Penal Code § 42.07(a)(4). Similarly, the language in subsection 42.07(a)(7) provides that “[a] person commits an offense if, with intent to harass, annoy, alarm, abuse, torment, or embarrass another, the person ... sends repeated electronic communications in a manner reasonably likely to harass, annoy, alarm, abuse, torment, embarrass, or offend another.” Id. § 42.07(a)(7).

*7 In light of the similarity of those provisions, we believe that subsection 42.07(a)(7) can reasonably be construed as being directed at people repeatedly using electronic communications to invade the personal privacy of another with the intent to inflict emotional distress. Cf. Ex parte Whiteside, 12 S.W.3d 819, 821 (Tex. Crim. App. 2000) (stating that when construing statutes, reviewing courts examine plain language of statute); Crouch v. State, 838 S.W.2d 252, 254 (Tex. Crim. App. 1992) (explaining that “[s]tatutes should be read as a whole and construed to give meaning to each part”). Accordingly, we are not persuaded that the use of the word “includes” in the definition for “[e]lectronic communication,” without more, renders subsection 42.07(a)(7) unconstitutionally overbroad.

For all of the reasons previously given and in light of the analyses from Scott and from our binding precedent in Blanchard, we overrule Ogle’s sole issue on appeal.<sup>2</sup>

only by the Free Speech Clause, but also by the Redress of Grievances Clause of the First Amendment.” However, other than referring to the Grievances Clause, Ogle does not provide any additional argument or cite any case law supporting the idea that the Grievances Clause has any applicability in this case. See Tex. R. App. P. 38.1(i) (providing that appellant’s brief must contain “appropriate citations to authorities”); Rodriguez v. State, 329 S.W.3d 74, 81 (Tex. App.—Houston [14th Dist.] 2010, no pet.) (explaining that failure to cite authority for appellate issue can result in waiver). Moreover, Ogle did not present this claim in his application for writ of habeas corpus that serves as the basis for this appeal. See Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a) (explaining that to preserve error for appeal, record must show that complaint was made to trial court and that trial court ruled on request or refused to rule and that “complaining party objected to the refusal”); Ex parte Tutton, No. 10-14-00360-CR, 2015 WL 4384496, at *3 (Tex. App.—Waco July 9, 2015, pet. ref’d) (mem. op., not designated for publication) (noting that arguments presented on appeal were not “made in his habeas-corpus application” and explaining that if appellate arguments “do not comport with arguments made in the trial court,” complaints are not preserved for appellate consideration).

CONCLUSION

Having overruled Ogle’s sole issue on appeal, we affirm the county court at law’s order denying Ogle’s application for writ of habeas corpus.
