MR. CHIEF JUSTICE BURGER: Mr. Grant, you may proceed.

ORAL ARGUMENT BY STEPHEN A. GRANT, ESQ.

ON BEHALF OF PETITIONER

MR. GRANT: Mr. Chief Justice and may it please the Court:

Twenty-five years have elapsed since this Court, in an opinion by Mr. Justice Black in Bell against Hood, left for another day the question of whether a violation of the Fourth Amendment gives rise to a Federal claim for damages. At long last the question is once again presented to the Court in this case.

Briefly the facts: the name of the case, Bivens against Six Unknown Federal Agents, really tells the story. It began in the early morning darkness in November five years ago. The six narcotics agents with guns drawn, forced their way into Bivens' home in the Bronx and proceeded to conduct a thorough and apparently fruitful search. They put handcuffs on him in front of his wife and children; took him away to be further questioned and booked, as well as subjected to an extremely thorough, humiliating search of his person.

At all times the agents acted without any legal authority without a search and arrest warrant. After the complaint against Bivens was dismissed, but too poor to hire a

1 lawyer, he decided to sue the agents for the outrage he 2 suffered. He knew the U. S. Constitution guaranteed each 3 citizen the right to be secure against unreasonable search and 4 seizure. He knew that the Federal Courts had general juris-
5 diction over cases arising under the constitution. He thought 6 he had a pretty good case.

7 With the able assistance of the U. S. Attorney's 8 office, the District Court made short shrift of -- the com-
9 plaint. No statute afforded a remedy against Federal officers.
10 In any case, the defendants had acted in the performance of 11 duty. Complaint dismissed.

12 The appeal of informa pauperis denied; the dis-
13 trict judge's certification that an appeal would be frivolous.
14 Fortunately for Bivens, a distinguished judge in the Second 15 Circuit Court of Appeals considered the complaint not so 16 frivolous. A hearing was granted and I was assigned counsel.

17 At this time the Department of Justice represen-18 ted the defendants, arguing with admirable dexterity that the 19 Fourth Amendment was intended simply to bar the defensive 20 privilege for an unreasonable search and seizure.

21 Q Could you keep your voice up a little, Mr.
22 Grant.

23 A Yes, Your Honor.

24 But that the privilege is nevertheless available
25 here because the defendants had acted within the outer

1 perimeter of their line of duty. The Circuit Court panel was 2 impressed by the lack of precedent for the damage remedy. It 3 concluded that enforcing the Fourth Amendment was a matter for 4 the Congress. It recognized that the privilege question was 5 properly raised. The ruling that Bivens had no cause of 6 action found it unnecessary to decide the issues. The judg-
7 ment dismissing the complaint was affirmed.

8 The first issue was whether violation of the 9 constitutional right to be secure against unreasonable search 10 and seizure gives rise to a Federal claim for damages. The 11 answer turns first on the intent of the framers. Second: on 12 the adequacy of existing remedies to fulfill that intent and 13 finally, on the role of the court in enforcing rights secured 14 by the constitution.

15 First, the intent of the framers: the right of the 16 people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers and 17 effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures shall not 18 be violated. These words: we, of course, have a promise to 19 the people and imperative to the executive, but perhaps most 20 important of all the command of keeping aware of the problems, 21 the practical problems of controlling governmental power, 22 they were a special mandate to the Judiciary that stood be-23 tween the people and their government.

24 This is clear from Madison's famous statement that 25 if the Bill of Rights were incorporated into the Constitution

1 independent tribunals of justice will consider themselves in 2 a peculiar manner the guardians of those rights; they would 3 resist every encroachment by the Legislative or the Executive.

4 The framers didn't say how the courts were to act 5 as guardians; how they were to resist the encroachments that 6 sooner or later must come; they didn't have to. But, as the 7 members of this Court well know, the amendment itself is based 8 on one of the great landmarks of English Constitutional law:
9 Entick against Carrington, a civil action in trespass against 10 the King's Messengers; a search and seizure conducted under 11 the invalid authority of a general warrant.

12 Lord Camden's ringing denunciation of unjustifi-13 able government intrusions in 1765 was well-known to the 14 colonists in their struggles against the King's customs 15 officers prior to the revolution. It was, as this Court has 16 noted several times, in the minds of the framers when they 17 drafted the Fourth Amendment.

18 And with the Entick case in mind they were no
19 doubt confident that the courts would enforce the constitu-
20 tional guarantee by the traditional remedy of civil damages.

21 Q Mr. Grant, do you know whatever ever happened
22 to the Bell and Boyd on remand?

23 A Yes, Your Honor. On bringing it to the Dis-24 trict Court they claimed, the plaintiffs' claim for a Federal 25 claim was rejected on the merits on the theory that if the

1 agents -- it was either claimed against the agents personally
2 in which case they were immune from suit; or if it was a claim
3 against the government they were also immune on their sovereign
4 immunity.

5 Q And no further appeal was taken?

6 A It was affirmed, I believe, by the Ninth
7 Circuit and that was where the matter rested.

8 Q It ended their appeal? Do you have any com-
9 ment as to why this issue really comes up only in 1971 --

10 A I think that is an extraordinary question and 11 if I could I would like to reserve that for later. I think 12 that is one of the extraordinary questions in this case.

13 Having said this much as to which I believe there 14 is no disagreement, the precise question becomes a presumed 15 intent of the framers as to the application of the constitu-
16 tional guarantee such as civil damage actions.

17 Our position is that Federal Common Law is the 18 source of the plaintiff's rights; that the constitutional 19 guarantee provides the basis in Federal law for all substan-20 tive incidents of the suit, including the claim itself, whether 21 there has been an unreasonable search and seizure, the measure 22 of damages, and the scope of the officers' defense.

23 In saying this, I rely first and foremost on the 24 language of the amendment, which says: "the constitutional 25 freedom shall not be violated," speaking in categorical terms

1 of securing the fundamental rights and in no way suggesting a
2 more limited application such as the merely foreclosing a 3 defense in the suit.

4 And I rely secondly, on the historical background;
5 on the very fact of the amendment's adoption at a time when 6 everyone knew that the common law under Entick against 7 Carrington already protected against unreasonable search and 8 seizure.

9 The amendment nothing unless it elevated the 10 common law right to the level of a guarantee that could not be 11 negated by state or even Federal law. And it meant little as 12 a guarantee if it was merely a lofty statement of principle; 13 a right without a remedy, dependent upon legislative action for 14 its enforcement, or was otherwise subject to the vicissitudes 15 of state law.

16 How little, indeed, when we consider that the 17 Congress hasn't acted in 180 years and uncertainties of 18 varying local rules the remedy for the state law has become 19 all but completely impotent.

20 The Government, however, argues --

21 Q Mr. Grant, when you speak of the vicissitudes
22 of state laws, I'm not quite sure what that embraces. Maybe 23 some states would not --

24 A Vicissitudes in the sense that state laws 25 develop in response to different considerations in the area of

1 trespass and those considerations are more or less developed
2 in all of the 50 States.

3 Q Well, I would have thought that most of the 4 law of trespass developed in the state courts and very little 5 of it ever in Federal courts.

6 A It certain did, Your Honor, but it developed
7 with respect, and I think Mr. Justice Harlan pointed this 8 out in Monroe against Pape: developed in a context where the 9 only question was the private right of action against another 10 private citizen. And the facts, the measure of recovery, 11 particularly the question of whether you could only recover
12 for the damages, physical damage to property.

13 Q Well, isn't it correct that many states
14 provide that statutes for cause of action against official 15 conduct that is conduct of officials, that is not authorized 16 official conduct?

17 A If they do, which I cannot answer, when you
18 say is any of this -- I do not know. But, if they do again 19 I would rely on the argument it happens to be a coincidence in 20 which state does and which state doesn't, and what principles 21 govern that cause of action as well.

22 And it is precisely that element of chance in what 23 state they are in and what state happens to provide for it 24 and I don't think the Federal rights would prevail.

25 The Government, however, argues that the framers

1 must have been thinking, in procedural terms, merely of fore-
2 closing the defense of justification. If the amendment was 3 intended simply to bar a claim and unreasonable search and 4 seizure was justified in the name of the law, the argument is 5 weak at both ends.

6 First, it says too little; and failure to explain
7 how, in the long line of decisions upholding constitutional 8 claims in equity, the amendment that provided this for one 9 type of relief, but not another.

10 Yet, as these decisions clearly suggest, an in-11 junction would be available to bar a Fourth Amendment viola-12 tion. Surely this must be because the framers' intent, in the 13 Federal interest, goes beyond procedural niceties by fore-
14 closing defenses, to the very securing of the constitutional 15 right. Yet how can this interest be sufficient for an in-16 junction and not for damages, particularly under a system of 17 law where equitable relief is the exception rather than the 18 rule.

19 On the other hand, the government's position says
20 too much. For the mere fact of foreclosing the justification
21 defense implies an intent on the part of the framers to vindi-
22 cate the constitutional right by and award of civil damages.
23 Yet, if absent congressional action state law were intended to 24 govern plaintiff's claim then were and are free not only to 25 leave the right uncertain as it now is, but even to oppose

1 -- of obstacles or bar civil liberty altogether.

2 Q I take it you think that what is involved
3 here is both whether the Federal Court has jurisdiction and 4 what the applicable law is.

5 A I want to make my position very clear: that 6 there are two questions that are very definitely raised in 7 this case, but I want to focus on the substantive law in par-
8 ticular and not --

9 Q Well, certainly --

10 A -- and not when the case is decided. To my 11 mind if the plaintiff had sued in the state court the law
12 that should govern this claim is Federal Law, because it's a 13 Federal right that he will be seeking to vindicate.

14 Q Well, it wouldn't necessarily mean that 15 state law would govern if the Federal Courts didn't have 16 jurisdiction. In other words, that still could be held that 17 there was no jurisdiction in the Federal Court but that in the 18 state court Federal law could govern.

19 A It certainly could.

20 The Government's final argument is that the 21 framers could not have intended to create a Federal cause of 22 action because if they had the Federal Court would have, at 23 the outset, been given jurisdiction over the cases arising 24 under the constitution.

25 The logic of this position compels the conclusion

1 that the Congress -- had not intended to create any enfor-
2 ceable Federal rights on statutes until 1875 when the original
3 jurisdiction was finally granted. Obviously this wasn't true.
4 The framers and Congress assumed that the Federal rights would 5 be enforced in the state courts. And the effectiveness of 6 this enforcement of the Fourth Amendment was assured by the 7 then accepted, omnipresence of the common law.

8 For, when the amendment was adopted Entick against 9 Carrington was assumed to be the common law throughout the 10 land. There could hardly have been any compelling need for 11 original Federal jurisdiction and the state courts could be 12 expected to enforce the principles of Entick with the uni-
13 formity derived from common custom and tradition.

14 Indeed, there was little need to distinguish
15 between state and Federal common law rights, for well over a 16 century afterward, when under the philosophy of Swift against 17 Tyson, the common law was regarded as a single and cohesive 18 body of principles.

19 This is why Slocum against Mayberry, on which the 20 government heavily relies for its view. In fact, it's pre-21 cisely the other way. If you look at the opinion of the 22 court, what Chief Justice Marshall did say was that damages 23 were to be sought in a "suit at common law," but that the 24 "common law tribunals of the United States were not available
25 to hear the claim because Congress had not given them juris-

1 diction."

2 He went on to say that the suit had to, therefore,
3 be brought in the state courts. But, contrary to the govern-
4 ment's suggestion, what he did not say was that the claim
5 therefore arose under and was governed by state law. For him,
6 and indeed, for the court for many years afterwards, such a 7 parochial dissection of the common law was unthinkable, and 8 thus it is that the question of governing law becomes vital 9 only when a common law becomes what the courts say it is in 10 fact. When, under Erie against Tompkins the pronouncements 11 of state judges are recognized as binding in the Federal 12 Courts and when asserting that the claim arises under and is 13 governed by state law may defeat the Federal right.

14 And in this context -- I repeat, in this context,
15 looking at the language and the background of the Fourth Amend-16 ment, it is inconceivable that the framers should have inten-
17 ded its enforcement to be subject to compromise in the state
18 law and the rights recognized in Entick against Carrington
19 forfeited because of Congressional inaction.

20 Turning to the second issue: the adequacy of 21 existing remedies. From the framers' intent to its fulfill-22 ment, it is arguable, at least in principle that as a matter 23 of Federal law the court should look to state law in civil 24 damage actions for unreasonable searches until the Congress 25 says otherwise. But, surely this turns most of all on whether

1 the framers' intent would thereby be fulfilled. The court
2 below concluded that it would; that plaintiff should be left
3 to sue under state law because existing remedies substantially 4 vindicated Fourth Amendment rights.

5 With due respect, this conclusion cannot be 6 sustained. It flies in the face of this Courts decision in 7 Mapp against Ohio and Monroe against Pape, both of which re-8 quired overriding substantial state interest. Because, as they 9 said in Mapp, existing state laws were worthless and futile.

10 Moreover, given Federal rules under the Civil 11 Rights Act against state officers, in the variety of local 12 rules, and this is the point in response to your question, Mr.
13 Chief Justice: the variety of local rules from state to state.
14 It means that identical conduct in an unreasonable search and 15 seizure will give rise to liability if committed by a state
16 but not a Federal officer and if committed in one jurisdic-
17 tion but not in another.

18 It leaves enforcement of Fourth Amendment rights 19 subject to the accidents of which badge the defendant is 20 wearing and on which side of a particular state boundary he 21 happens to act.

22 And in terms of the larger question of deter-23 mining police misconduct, the lower court's conclusion cannot 24 be reconciled with the results of more detailed studies by 25 scholars in the field. The most extensive work today, which

1 no doubt the members of the court have seen is that of 2 Professor Oaks of the University of Chicago Law School. It 3 is a recently published article which is cited on page 31 of 4 the Government's brief. He concludes that the exclusionary
5 rule has a relatively little impact as a deterrent to police-6 men's conduct because most police activity is directed not at 7 securing evidence for prosecution but in apprehending
8 criminals and maintaining order.

9 More important, he cites evidence in Canada that 10 suggests that a civil remedy is reasonably effective in curbing 11 the police and strongly urges that such a remedy be given a 12 chance to do the job here.

13 Turning finally to the role of the courts: what 14 is the responsibility of the courts when an aggrieved citizen
15 enlists their aid to vindicate a claim based on a naked
16 violation of the Fourth Amendment? Of course the Government, 17 the Executive, insists the courts shouldn't act. They argue,
18 and I quote: "that there must be a showing of the utmost 19 necessity; must be vital, indispensable, essential and absolutely 20 necessary."

21 In having themselves so restrictively set the 22 stage on the question to be decided, they proceed to argue 23 that ineffectual state remedies are nonetheless, not totally 24 worthless; that the matter should be left to a Congress that 25 hasn't acted in 180 years.

1 To all this I would say only three things: first,
2 indeed, necessity must be shown for the courts to act. It
3 is here as plain as anything can be. If the need to protect 4 Fourth Amendment rights requires the court to suppress 5 reliable evidence in criminal prosecutions at the expense of 6 society, surely it provides the basis for a simple court
7 remedy that would be available to the innocent and the guilty
8 alike, and place the burden on the irresponsible police 9 officer where it more properly belongs.

10 Q What standard of liability do you suggest 11 the courts fashion, if they take on the job of enforcing the 12 Fourth Amendment directly?

13 A Mr. Justice White, I think there are two 14 different questions: one is whether the plaintiff has a cause 15 of action and developing the Federal rule.

16 And one, which I think your question is directed 17 to, which is the defendant's defense of privilege, which 18 should be sufficiently broad to protect the policeman acting 19 reasonably in discharging his duties.

20 Q -- the policeman believing that he had 21 probable cause or --

22 A Yes, Your Honor, I would --

23 Q Even though he was quite wrong?

24 A Even though he was quite wrong, if he 25 reasonably believed that he had probable cause that should be

1 a sufficient defense in my view, and I think that's consistent
2 with this Court's opinion in Pierson against Ray. But, I 3 think it's a separate question from whether the plaintiff has 4 a right to sue, he has a Federal right that should be governed
5 by Federal rules. That's already --

6 Q His subjective good faith would be suf-7 ficient defense, do you submit?

8 A I don't think I said that.

9 Q Well, that's the reason I asked the question.

10 A I think that this is beyond the scope of 11 what the Court -- well, I'm not so sure; if the Court goes on 12 to decide, which I urge it to do, that Barr against Matteo 13 should be explained as applying to defamation with respect to 14 its discretion within the outer perimeter of the line of duty,
15 then it should indicate what the defense if government 16 privilege is in trespass.

17 And the basis for that defense is established by 18 the traditional cases of trespass in Pierson against Ray, and 19 that would be a privilege for the officer's reasonable con-
20 duct in discharging his duty. Now, that is not subjective 21 good faith, and I don't think society has an interest in sub-22 jective law enforcement. If the other people in society are 23 held up to a standard of reasonable conduct, I think the police 24 should be as well.

25 Q Is it the same test as would make a search

1 constitutional?

2 A No, it would not be the same test because --

3 Q Not the same test?

4 A I don't think it would be as strict a test 5 and also I think that when you take the practical question of 6 suing an officer who is trying to do his duty, for personal 7 liability in front of a civil jury that in effect, the test 8 would not be as rigid as the court trying to apply these --

9 Q Well, this would be, in logic and in theory.
10 You use the word "reasonableness," and that's the same word,
11 -- the same word that the United States Constitution uses 12 that makes a search constitutional.

13 A I think the question now is the privilege of 14 the officer, which is a defense in a suit for personal 15 liability, whereas the question, for instance, of the probable 16 cause, at least where it has arisen for the most part, has 17 been in whether you can use the evidence against a criminal 18 in a prosecution and I'm not sure they are the same.

19 I wish I could give you satisfactory answer to 20 that.

21 But, I will move on right to the second question, 22 since I only have a minute.

23 On the basis of the complaint in preliminary 24 papers the government invoked the defense of governmental 25 privilege in the District Court, as well as in the Circuit

1 Court of Appeals. They even urged the Circuit Court to go so 2 far as sustaining the defense in the face of a clear and 3 conscious violation of the constitution, and they cited three 4 Circuit Court decisions to that effect, which I noted on pages 5 20 and 21 of my brief.

6 Now, that the issue is finally in front of this 7 Court, they say that the same complaint, the preliminary 8 papers, afford insufficient facts to -- for an informed judg-9 ment, obviously suggesting on the remand there will be 10 additional facts to excuse the defendants.

11 I think clearly the problem is not with the facts;
12 it's with the judgment. It has to be reversed and reversed
13 by this Court because it has arisen, because this Court's 14 pronouncements in Spalding against Vilas and Barr v. Matteo, 15 were misapplied by the Fifth Circuit in Norton against 16 McShane to shield an unconstitutional arrest and detention.
17 The First Circuit has already rejected the Norton decision.
18 Remanding the issue here to the Second Circuit will simply 19 perpetuate a conflict that can only be resolved by this Court.

20 And so the position of the Petitioner, we very 21 strongly urge that this issue is in the case that it should 22 be reversed.

23 I would like to reserve the remaining portion of 24 my time for rebuttal.

25 MR. CHIEF JUSTICE BURGER: Very well, Mr. Grant.

1 Mr. Feit, you may proceed whenever you are ready.

2 ORAL ARGUMENT BY JEROME FEIT, ESQ.

3 ON BEHALF OF RESPONDENTS

4 MR. FEIT: Mr Chief Justice and may it please the 5 Court:

6 At the outset I would like to make clear what, in 7 the government's view is, and what is not involved in this 8 case.

9 First of all, we do not contend that the District
10 Court lacks jurisdiction under Section 1331(a) in the sense of 11 Bell v. Hood for a cause of action stated on one construction 12 of the constitution and defeated on another.

13 The critical question here and the one left un-14 decided in Bell v. Hood by this Court, is recognizing the 15 complaint on its face for pleading purposes, states an 16 actionable tort under state law, should also be read as giving 17 rise to a constitutional tort so that the elements of the 18 cause of action, that is the type of injuries compensable and 19 the kinds of damages recoverable which is governed by Feder-20 ally created law.

21 Our answer is: no; basically because of lack of 22 necessity. Indeed, the tort remedy, as I would suggest a 23 little later in the argument, is basically ineffectual as 24 most other commentators have suggested.

25 Q Well, what would you say if the Court

1 entertained a suit by this very plaintiff, based on the 2 constitution and said: certainly we will give a remedy; we 3 have no jurisdictional problems in our court about --

4 A What would happen as a practical matter, Mr.
5 Justice, is that if this suit had been brought in state court 6 you would have been removed by the Federal Government to the 7 Federal Court under 1442(a) of the Removal Statute because the 8 Federal defenses --

9 Q That isn't the point. The point is: I'm 10 trying to ask if you brought a suit in the state court, this 11 same plaintiff, suing under the Fourth Amendment and the state 12 court said: certainly we'll entertain an action to enforce the 13 Fourth Amendment against the officer. And the governing law 14 would be Federal Law then; wouldn't it?

15 A The governing law in regard to the issues of 16 justification for the officer's action in arresting the 17 Petitioner or the plaintiff in that case the law with regard 18 to perhaps defenses of immunity would be governed by Federal 19 law.

20 But the nature of the cause of action itself, as 21 I have indicated, the type of injuries compensable or the kind
22 of damages recoverable would not be governed by Federal law.

23 Q Why not?

24 A Unless this Court creates a constitutional 25 tort, because historically --

1 Q Well, why couldn't it -- a state court -- it
2 would be beyond the power of the state court to say to this 3 plaintiff: you seek to sue under the Fourth Amendment; we 4 accept the suit, in that very sense. It is a suit under the 5 Fourth Amendment and we're going to enforce the Fourth Amend-6 ment in this suit. A state court couldn't say that?

7 A State court could say, assuming, as I have 8 said, that it has not been moved to the Federal Court as it
9 always will be, against a Federal officer under the 1442(a).
10 The state court could set a precedent and say: looking to the 11 officer's action we will determine this as it has to, under 12 Federal law.

13 But, I have great difficulty, unless this Court 14 decides that the arising under jurisdiction of 1331(a) creates 15 a Federal cause of action that the state court could look to 16 Federal law with regard to the injury and the damages com-17 pensible.

18 Q Can I get one point straight? You keep 19 saying "if it was removed back to the Federal Court."

20 A No; I meant to say -- if I did say that, 21 excuse me, Mr. Justice. As I said: the case will always be 22 removed to the Federal Court as it has been in the past under 23 the 1442(a)

24 Q And will be tried under the exact same -- 25 take this particular case, filed in the state court. It will

1 removed to the Federal Court.

2 A Correct.

3 Q And proceed with the exact same pleadings
4 you have right now.

5 A What would happen -- that is correct.

6 Q Well, what, other than motion is accomplished
7 by sending it back to the state court?

8 A Well, this was never commenced in the state 9 court. The issue is not what would be gained. I think, to our 10 point of view, what would happen would be the court would be 11 creating a constitutional tort and Petitioner has talked about 12 the history of the Fourth Amendment and I would like to in-13 dicate that the Government's view is entirely contrary --

14 Q As it is staged now wouldn't the statute of 15 limitations take care of the state authority?

16 A In terms of, you mean in terms of the govern-
17 ment's state, Your Honor?

18 Well, in terms of the statute of limitations the 19 -- this alleged invasion of privacy occurred in November 26, 20 1965. The lawsuit was not commenced until June of 1967, a 21 year and a half after the event. If it had been brought to the 22 state court against a state officer, there is a one-year 23 statute of limitations.

24 Q But as of right now if it goes back to the 25 state court it's out of court. Is that right?

1 A Well, and even if this Court decides to 2 create a cause of action and we, of course have suggested that 3 it does not reach Barr and Matteo at all; if it goes back to 4 the Federal Court, for example, and you say there is such a 5 cause of action, presumably this would be dismissed under the 6 statute of limitations. The Government could allege the 7 defense as the statute of limitations.

8 Q Is there a cause of action for injunctive
9 relief, as Mr. Grant suggested?

10 A There, and I think this gets into our general
11 proposition: historically there has been a recognition of a 12 cause of action and injunctive relief primarily in situations
13 against the enforcement of state statutes --

14 Q But, is that for violation of the Fourth
15 Amendment?

16 A I would assume that there could be a situation 17 where there would be.

18 Q Well, then would this Court be creating 19 a cause of action?

20 A It would be arising under the constitution in 21 terms of --

22 Q That's not my question, Mr. Feit. If there 23 is already a cause of action for injunctive relief for a 24 violation of the Fourth Amendment, why does the Government 25 suggest that we would be creating a cause of action?

1 A I believe the Government --

2 Q It's a remedy that damages won out on.

3 A Because that we think that the two are some-4 what different. For example:--

5 Q What two are different?

6 A Because the action for injunctive relief,
7 which is essentially an action which rests on necessity. For 8 example, as to a Federal officer the law is not clear. I think 9 it looks the other way. The state could not enjoin the 10 Federal laws. At least Professor Warren thinks that and you 11 suggest in Wheeldin v. Wheeler.

12 So, there is no remedy with regard to any state
13 court with regard to a Federal officer in terms of injunctive 14 relief. In that sense it fits our general proposition. In 15 other words, this Court recognizes that a remedy should exist 16 in the Federal Courts but there is no remedy existing in the 17 state courts, and the injunction proceeding fits the need of 18 necessity. It would be monstrous, I submit, that there 19 should be a right without a remedy.

20 Clearly here there is a remedy for damages in the 21 state court and it seems to me it's Petitioner's burden to show 22 that there is a necessity to create a damage action. It is 23 our position and the position of those who would -- the commen-24 tators who dealt with this matter in complete detail, that the 25 difficulties with regard to the damage action could not

1 lie in the vagaries of state law, as is alleged here by the 2 Petitioner.

3 Essentially, the fact of the matter is that the 4 hesitancy of those who have been arrested to sue the police, 5 and if they do sue, the undeniable fact that juries are 6 reluctant to hold Federal or state officers personally respon-7 sible for damages at the request of one who may have a 8 criminal record or comes from the lowest economic levels of 9 society.

10 It seems to us, as the writers have pointed out, 11 that other remedies should be sought; perhaps against the 12 police entity in terms of governmental liability, amending the 13 Tort Claims Act, perhaps.

14 Should administrative boards independent of the 15 police, be established in the matter of police behavior; and 16 if such bodies are created, what are their duties to be? And 17 these are the kinds of questions, it seems to me, that are 18 best suited for legislative determination and study --

19 Q Well, didn't the Congress, in passing 1983 20 and keeping it on the books all these years, turn over, in 21 effect, to the courts the task of fashioning a good many, a 22 good part of a Federal law of constitutional rights against 23 state officers?

24 A Yes; and of course, I think that tends to 25 support our position that is that Congress, in 1983, as this

1 Court read it in Monroe and Pape, created by statute, a civil 2 remedy against state officers --

3 Q But left it very open-ended in the sense that 4 all of the internal rules and standards had to be fashioned 5 by the court.

6 A Well, under 1988 you look to where the 7 Federal common law applies and you look to the state courts --

8 Q You don't think it's odd at all to have the 9 cases against state officers rest on Federal law and the 10 liability of Federal officers rest exclusively on state laws?

11 A I think this is not a real meaningful dis-
12 tinction because in all of these cases against Federal officers 13 brought in the state courts will be removed to the Federal 14 Courts.

15 Q I know, but on your position the law applied
16 to the Federal Court will be state law.

17 A The law with regard to the nature of the 18 damages and with regard to the type of injury compensable.
19 It's quite clear that the question is to whether or not the 20 officer acted on probable cause or whether he had immunity
21 from suit. These questions, quite clearly, will be governed 22 by Federal law.

23 What I am suggesting to the Court is that the 24 notion, that the vagaries of state law, the differences in 25 state law are the reasons why the court remedy has been

1 ineffectual; are not really accurate. The reason is, as I
2 have said, is that wherever the case is tried, juries gener-
3 ally do not like to impose the liability on police officers.
4 And no one, none of the commentators, even Professor 5 cited so extensively by the Petitioners, suggests governmental 6 responsibility, the doctrine of governmental responsibility, 7 perhaps liquidated damages.

8 Other writers have talked, as I have said, about 9 the setting up of --

10 Q What's left for state law under your sub-11 mission? The case is now removed to the Federal Court and 12 you say that on most of the important elements, both the 13 cause of action and the defense the Federal law governs.

14 A I say that as to the essentially as to the 15 defense is Federal law.

16 Q That's what I said. Now, then what's left 17 for state law?

18 A As I understand it what would be left to 19 state law would be the measure of damages; the type of 20 damages that could be recoverable --

21 Q What do you mean by type? Do you mean as 22 between --

23 A Punitive, compensatory damages. I might 24 point out, for example, that New York State in its action, 25 where this occurred, was a leader in allowing responsibility

1 for damages for mental suffering; that kind of thing, which 2 we submit should be governed by state law. But question of 3 justification, which is the kind of conduct that was engaged 4 in, that would be governed by Federal law; where there was 5 an immunity suit that would be governed by the Federal law.

6 Q My difficulty is that the Government
7 apparently concedes so much, so many of the issues would be 8 ruled by Federal law, but something, you tell us, is left for 9 state law, and I must confess: I don't follow why the 10 distinction.

11 Q Certainly it can't be to protect the Federal 12 Courts because you just said all the cases are going to end
13 up in the Federal Court anyway.

14 A No, it's not to protect the Federal Courts
15 in that sense. I think that essentially what I am suggesting 16 is --

17 Q What difference is it going to make in the 18 plaintiff's cause of action. You now concede that he has one;
19 all the issues are governed by Federal law, those that you 20 have specified, assuming that they all result favorably to the 21 plaintiff. Now, where is the, as between state law and 22 Federal law on the issue of damages?

23 A Well, it seems to me that it is a juris-24 prudential kind of thing as to whether or not this Court, as 25 it was not done for over two hundred years of litigation in

1 these areas, to determine that a course of action exists under 2 the constitution without the showing of necessity. It seems 3 to us, for example, that if this Court said that a cause of 4 action is governed by Federal law, maybe creating a constitu-
5 tional tort. Could Congress then decide: well, we do not 6 think that the tort remedy is effective; would Congress be 7 barred from saying: we do not think the tort method is an 8 effective method. We want to try something else, assuming the 9 Federal law enforcement officer is of the type which requires 10 some other kind of treatment. Would you need a constitutional 11 amendment for that?

12 It seems to me that you raise quite a difficult
13 problem. Even if it doesn't raise constitutional questions, 14 would Congress be chilled in further examination and decide,
15 well, we'll leave this matter to the courts for determination?

16 Q Do you think you could go into a state court 17 or a Federal court and sue a Federal officer for having 18 broken into the house at night and seized a bunch of goods and 19 asked for an injunction and a turn-over order to have him 20 return the property.

21 A I would have great doubt about that. This 22 Court has not decided that --

23 Q That's just an injunction; isn't it?

24 A Well, I think what I'm suggesting is --

25 Q You couldn't sue the Federal officer to get

1 the property back?

2 Q You could take a replevin action.

3 A A replevin action, you mean sue to get the 4 property back in the state court --

5 Q Well, I know, but a replevin action rests on 6 a violation of the Fourth Amendment.

7 A But, of course, again the -- that question,
8 the question would be removed to the Federal Courts.

9 Q Well, would the Federal law govern it? Or --

10 A I would have to say that the state laws would 11 govern the course of action.

12 Q Why would it?

13 A I thought I had been able to establish it, 14 because --

15 Q It's not Erie Railroad, because this is not a 16 diversity case.

17 A No. It seems to me that what it might lead 18 to is really what we're concerned about is if you start creating 19 Federal causes of action, as I say, they may be constitutional 20 kinds of remedies that are being created.

21 Q Well, what happened in this case if it's filed 22 in the state court and removed to the Federal Court? Who 23 controls the damages; the state or the Federal Government?

24 A Well, it's our submission that the measure of 25 damages would be governed by state law and I might point out

1 that New York State ois a leader in compensatory damage 2 recovery for alleged invasion, mental invasions of the 3 Petitioner or claimants.

4 Q So, why can't you hear this now on the same 5 basis?

6 A Yes; it would be --

7 Q Well, like I say, let's make believe it was 8 filed in the state court first; it wouldn't be here; would 9 you?

10 A No; if this case were filed in the state
11 court, removed to the Federal Court to be tried in the Federal 12 Court --

13 Q Right.

14 Q But, what I have missed somewhere along the 15 line is why do you say the state law won't be applicable?

16 A Because -- why state law would not be 17 applicable?

18 Q Would be; would be.

19 Q To the extent you say it is, which I gather 20 is very small.

21 A I thought -- my position is: the state law
22 would be applicable because the cause of action on the common
23 law basis did not arise from the constitution in the Fourth 24 Amendment. The constitution essentially is that the historical 25 bases, I think, clearly show, was aimed at securing that right

1 and creating the rule that you could not rely on writs of 2 assistance and general warrants for justification --

3 Q You are assuming what kind of a cause of 4 action? For trespass?

5 A Assuming a cause of action for trespass,
6 false imprisonment --

7 Q Or possibly replevin, as Justice White says.
8 What you want is the property back. Your two million dollars 9 worth of whatever -- contraband. You want that back, and --

10 A Well, as I say, if --

11 Q What if you sued in the state court simply 12 for a violation of your Fourth Amendment rights and the state, 13 that particular state said: that's fine; we have a court 14 remedy for that. We're under the constitution of the United 15 States around here in this state and we give a tort remedy for 16 a violation of constitutional rights.

17 And then that's removed to the Federal Court?

18 A That's removed to the Federal Court.

19 Q And then you have an action then in the 20 Federal Courts, removable only because the defendants are 21 Federal officers.

22 A Federal officers.

23 Q And what's the difference, then, between what 24 you would have then and what your -- Petitioner alleges you 25 would have here?

1 A Well, I think you would have there, in a
2 sense, in which -- and I'd like to get to the second point -- 3 the thing you have then, it seems to us, is the creation of a 4 constitutional cause of action.

5 Q It's a cause of action for damages based upon 6 rights that are accorded to you under the constitution. Now, 7 you might have a cause of action for damages based upon the 8 rights that are accorded upon you by the common law of 9 negligence, if you were hit by an automobile. It doesn't 10 mean it's a constitutional cause of action.

11 A Well, it seems to us that there are defects
12 in creating that kind of remedy, even if it isn't a constitu-13 tional tort in that sense could Congress then change it, as 14 against Federal Courts?

15 Q Well, that's another case; isn't it? That's 16 a --

17 A And secondly -- for instance, if you
18 recognize the existence of this Federal cause of action, might 19 it not be -- have an overdetering effect on Federal officers?

20 Again, it's against Wheeler and Wheeldin, which is 21 was cited by this Court several years ago, where this Court 22 refused to apply that course of action dealing with the 23 granting of process and the Court pointed out in an opinion by 24 Mr. Justice Douglas that we're not in the free-wheeling days of 25 Erie against Tompkins.

1 Essentially, our position on the cause of action
2 issue is that we're concerned as to what may be the conse-
3 quences of the creation of that kind of action on behalf of 4 the suing individual. And it seems to us that there are 5 possibilities that Congress may not act. This is the kind of 6 an area of what are the natures of the remedies that should 7 be afforded are quite difficult to determine. And it seems 8 to us that counsel's judicial restraint and requires legis-
9 lative or perhaps Congressional action in the area.

10 Q Well, what is the amount he asked for here?

11 A The amount he asked for here was $15,000
12 against each Federal officer.

13 Q That's certainly not a very unusual remedy;
14 is it? It's nothing that takes a great deal of craftsmanship
15 or creativity to understand a cause of action for money 16 damages.

17 A No, it does not. I have tried to indicate 18 the reasons why we feel, however, the Court should not create 19 the cause of action for the reasons as I have tried to say, 20 for fear that it might create a constitutional tort limited to 21 Congress.

22 But, if the Court should reject our view -- if I 23 may use my remaining time on the remaining issue -- and should 24 reject our view and determine that a cause of action for 25 damages should be created on the -- under the Fourth Amendment,

1 so that this was properly brought in the Federal Court. We 2 strongly urge that it should not now decide the question of 3 official immunity pressed upon it by Petitioner.

4 While Petitioner says so, and the record can read
5 both ways, it is not clear that the District Court reached 6 that issue, but even if it did, the Court of Appeals certainly 7 did not. It clearly refrained from reaching the question of 8 immunity.

9 The only facts in the record consists of Petitioner's 10 brief complaint as a motion for summary judgment, the 11 government's motion to dismiss and the accompanying affidavit.
12 Without appealing the District Court dismissed in a short 13 memorandum on the grounds that it had no jurisdiction. In a 14 subsequent memorandum denying the motion to appeal at the -- 15 found additionally that no cause of action had been stated.

16 The record, I think is in our judgment, wholly 17 adequate to permit an informed judgment as to whether these 18 agents were acting within the scope of their duties. It may 19 well be, under the development of the facts, that the agents 20 were indeed acting with probable cause. This is not the 21 kind of complaint where the record, at page 1 and 2 for 22 example, that's set forth in Monroe v. Pape, where 13 Chicago 23 police officers entered at the early hours of the morning; 24 caused Mr. Monroe and his family to stand naked, then took 25 Mr. Monroe down to headquarters for intensive investigation.

1 As I say, the circumstances surrounding the 2 officers' actions may be expendable so as to be completely 3 justified under the Fourth Amendment. On the other hand, the 4 government may be able to assert that if there was a violation
5 of the Fourth Amendment it is wholly technical --

6 Q But, the government prevented all of that by 7 its motion for summary judgment; right?

8 A Well, it seems to me that the government 9 should --

10 Q Is that right?

11 A The government moved to switch the complaint 12 and --

13 Q Well, I'm sorry for my language, but --

14 A And filed an affidavit relying on the claim 15 that the action was brought under the --

16 Q Well, how can you argue about what you would 17 prove when you weren't interested in proving anything?

18 A Well, it seems to us that the facts that the 19 government may have made a mistake or that the court did not 20 require -- the District Court did not require further govern-21 mental affidavits of further showing -- it seems to us that 22 this Court should not be required to decide a question of such 23 significance as the Barr and Matteo proposition on this kind 24 of barren record.

25 Thus, it seems to us under the procedures for

1 relief based upon the new Federal Rules of Procedure -- of the 2 Federal Rules of Civil Procedure; the further affidavits 3 should be submitted to permit the record to be fleshed out.
4 And this Court should not reach in this very barren context,
5 this very significant question as to the scope of the immunity
6 doctrine as applied to Federal agents.

7 Q Mr. Feit, was that suggestion made to the 8 Court of Appeals, do you know?

9 A I think the suggestion was not made to the 10 Court of Appeals. The Court of Appeals specifically, however, 11 refrained. The Government argued the Barr and Matteo issue in 12 the Court of Appeals. The Court of Appeals, however, speci-13 fically refrained from deciding that question, finding that 14 there was no cause of action available, believing that it 15 should not create one because of the rule of exclusion and 16 that there was no need for the creation of such a remedy.

17 For these reasons it is our basic position that 18 the Court should not create a constitutional tort and dismiss 19 the complaint. If it disagrees with us on this issue, however, 20 we strongly urge that it not reach the immunity issue, since 21 no record exists upon which that issue could be fairly decided.
22 It should, instead, remand the case to the District Court for 23 a further development of the record on that issue and on other 24 possible issues of justification for the official action.

25 Thank you.

1 MR. CHIEF JUSTICE BURGER: Thank you, Mr. Feit.

2 Mr. Grant, you have about seven minutes left.

3 REBUTTAL ARGUMENT BY STEPHEN A. GRANT, ESQ.

5 MR. GRANT: I'll make only a few remarks unless 6 there are questions from the bench.

7 First: when you asked if state law governs this 8 crime. If state law governs this crime we will go back to the 9 District Court. We're out of court, if Mr. Feit was correct 10 in saying that the state statute of limitations bars the --

11 Q I gather the statute of limitations was --

12 A I think we brought it two years after the 13 trespass.

14 Q Another year.

15 A And that's precisely the kind of question, 16 and there are obviously other issues besides the damages that 17 would bear on the Federal right.

18 What is required here is not, as the government 19 so strongly suggests, creating a new cause of action in the 20 sense of defining a new and certainly not a constitutional 21 tort.

22 Here, unlike Wheeler against Wheeldin, we already 23 have in the constitution a prescription against an unreasonable 24 search and seizure and the tort of trespass is as old as any 25 a common law. This Court is asked to hold nothing more than at

1 such a time honored claim than trespass is governed by 2 Federal law and based on a Fourth Amendment violation. And 3 what is required would not, again, as the government suggests,
4 freeze Fourth Amendment remedies in a mode that could only be 5 broken by a constitutional amendment.

6 What we're talking about is not redefining the 7 Fourth Amendment, but about its enforcement in the matter of 8 Federal common law free from local rules. Such common law 9 could, consistent with the amendment, be changed by legislative 10 action. And even if the right to damages were called a con-
11 stitutional right, there is nothing to prevent the Congress
12 from requiring the claim to be asserted against the government 13 itself, or providing for indemnity for its officers.

14 Finally, what we are asking would not, as worried 15 the court below, lead down a long and uncertain road in 16 creating Federal rules, for you would open a Pandora's box of 17 civil litigation to vindicate constitutional claims.

18 The courts, and particularly the Federal Courts 19 responsibility to formulate their rules and to determine the 20 difficult question of which constitutional violations give 21 rise to damage claims, is already present under the Civil 22 Rights Act.

23 Recognizing the Federal nature of the plaintiff's
24 claim here would be if the Courts later so wished, an easily 25 distinguished decision, resting as it must, not merely on the

1 Fourth Amendment, but on the specific intent of the framers,
2 and on the background of common law that imposed personal 3 liability.

4 In concluding, I would like to return to the 5 question raised by Mr. Justice Blackmun, to a thought that I 6 suggested at the beginning. For me it's extraordinary that 7 the fundamental questions in this case arise to this Court's 8 decision over 200 years after they were settled in England in 9 Entick against Carrington, and 180 years after the framers
10 attempted to incorporate the promise of Entick into the Fourth
11 Amendment.

12 And, as I said, 25 years after this Court so
13 clearly suggested the availability of a Federal claim in Bell
14 against Hood. The explanation, as the courts know too well, 15 does not lie in any dearth of unreasonable searches and 16 seizures. Such abuses continue and apparently unabated by 17 judicial suppression for legally seized evidence.

18 Obviously there is something fundamentally wrong 19 in the understanding of the people and of the police as to the 20 meaning of the Fourth Amendment. But it is, in the practical 21 sense, the guarantee that can and will be enforced.

22 If there is to be a change it will not come
23 from simply sustaining the right to sue in Federal Courts.
24 And, as the Government points out in its brief, the Civil 25 Rights Act was recognized over ten years ago, yet the use of

1 the Civil Rights Act remedies have been minimal. Stronger 2 medicine is needed.

3 A reaffirmation of the citizen's right under 4 Federal law and the Government's liability in clear and re-
5 sounding terms that will be heard and understood by the people
6 and by the police.

7 And from where would come, from a Congress that 8 recently authorized no knock entry by the police; clearly not.
9 It would be from this Court or not at all. And looking at the 10 25 years between Bell against Hood and today, it would be now 11 or very possibly never in our time.

12 Thank you.

13 Q Suppose we were to hold that there is a cause
14 of action and Congress has a bill saying there should not be a 15 cause of action. What would be the situation?

16 A If this Court were to hold that the plaintiff
17 had a right under the constitution for compensation for a 18 violation of the Fourth Amendment, such a law, I believe, would 19 be in derogation of the Fourth Amendment, but that doesn't 20 mean that Congress doesn't have considerable flexibility. As 21 I pointed out, they could easily adopt a bill that would re-22 quire like the Federal Tort Claims Act. All they would have to 23 do would be to modify it so the suit could be brought against 24 the government.

25 Q Your idea is -- your belief is that if we were

1 to hold there is a cause of action and Congress has studied
2 the matter and reached the conclusion there should not be a
3 cause of action, that the Congressional act would be uncon-4 stitutional?

5 A I would certainly defer to the Court's 6 judgment, but that would be my position; yes. I believe it
7 would be a derogation of the Fourth Amendment, such a statute.

8 Q You wouldn't think Congress, instead of 9 putting it that way, could say the Federal Court shall have no
10 jurisdiction to hear suits against Federal officers?

11 A That is precisely why I insist that the 12 question is not simply jurisdictional --

13 Q Well, I know but -- how about answering my 14 question.

15 A I'm sorry, Mr. Justice White.

16 Q Well, what if Congress didn't put it the way 17 Mrs Justice Black put it to you, but just said: the Federal 18 Court shall have no jurisdiction to hear any cases against 19 Federal officers?

20 A That would be fine; the suit could be brought 21 in the state court but the point is that the law in the state
22 court would be Federal law and it would be subject to being 23 brought up to this Court and the rules, hopefully, would be 24 loud and clear on the right to damages for all kinds of suf-
25 fering and the rules that defends liability would be equally

1 clear. The Fourth Amendment would be vindicated in the state
2 courts. That, of course, was the system before 1875; exactly 3 the --

4 Q Could Congress repeal the exclusionary rule?
5 I guess not, after Mapp against Ohio, which held it was part 6 of the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendments.

7 I guess your answer is no?

8 A Yes. But there is no question in Mapp against 9 Ohio it rested very strongly on the inadequacy of other 10 remedies.

11 Q Well, it rested as reported to rest on the 12 finding that the exclusionary rule was part of the Fourth and 13 Fourteenth Amendments, which was something new.

14 A I think that's right, but there may very well 15 be room, once the underpinning of the inadequacy of civil 16 remedies if there were effective civil remedies, for an 17 argument that it is essential in the case where it is being
