P R O C E E D I N G S

JUSTICE BRENNAN: We will hear arguments next in 80-1595, United States v. Frady. Mr. Frey, you may begin whenever you are ready.

ORAL ARGUMENT OF ANDREW L. FREY, ESQ.
ON BEHALF OF THE PETITIONER

MR. FREY: Thank you Mr. Justice Brennan, and may it please the Court:

In March 1963 Thomas Bennett was beaten and stomped to death in his home. Respondent and a co-defendant were apprehended after emerging from Bennett's home by police officers called to the scene by neighbors. They were covered with Bennett's blood and co-defendant Gordon had just discarded on the street a wallet that was taken from Bennett.

In November 1963, respondent was convicted of first degree murder and of robbery, and sentenced to death by the jury. On his appeal, the case was heard by the en banc D.C. Circuit, which reversed the sentence of death for procedural improprieties, but affirmed the conviction of first degree murder.

After a series of unsuccessful collateral attacks on his conviction and one successful one relating to his sentence, respondent commenced the present proceeding in 1979, nearly 16 years after he had been convicted.

1           The challenge in this proceeding is certain 2 instructions which were given to the jury at his trial on 3 the element of malice, which is one of the elements of first 4 degree murder. Now, specifically, the instructions that the 5 court of appeals addressed were three. The first was the 6 instruction given in Sandstrom that a person is presumed to 7 intend the natural and probable consequences of his act.
8 The court did not rely on this instruction as a ground for 9 reversal. I'm looking at page 27 of the Joint Appendix, and 10 page 28.

11           The second part of the malice instruction that was 12 troublesome was the statement that in determining whether a 13 wrongful act is intentionally done and is therefore done 14 with malice aforethought -- you should again bear in mind.

15           Now, it is correct, as the District of Columbia 16 Circuit recognized several years after its decision on 17 Frady's original appeal, that this is an improper statement 18 because it is not necessarily the case that an intentional 19 act is therefore done with malice.

20           Similarly, in discussing the significance of the 21 use of a weapon in this case, on page 28 of the Joint 22 Appendix, the district court said "The law infers or 23 presumes from the use of such weapon, in the absence of 24 explanatory or mitigating circumstances, the existence of 25 the malice essential to culpable homicide." That

1 instruction also was disapproved by the District of Columbia
2 Circuit in subsequent cases.

3           No objection was made by counsel to any of these 4 instructions.

5           QUESTION: Mr. Frey, before you leave the specific 6 instructions, do you happen to know whether these 7 instructions were given to the jury in written form? Or 8 were they just read orally?

9           MR. FREY: I'm afraid I don't know.

10          QUESTION: It appears they were read orally, but I 11 can't really be sure.

12          MR. FREY: I'm not sure. I will come back to the 13 instructions in a moment because there's another point I 14 want to make about them, but first I'd like to summarize for 15 the Court what the court of appeals held in ordering that 16 habeas corpus relief be granted to respondent in this case.

17          First it held, citing this Court's opinion in 18 Davis v. United States, that the standard of review of such 19 a claim on collateral attack is plain error under Rule 52(b)
20 of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure.

21          Secondly, it held that if the standard is not 22 plain error, but rather the cause and prejudice standard of 23 Davis and of Wainwright v. Sykes, then that was satisfied.
24 The cause prong satisfied because it would have been futile
25 to object to these instructions because they were standard

1 at the time they were given; the prejudice prong essentially 2 satisfied because of the court's conclusion that it was not 3 clearly harmless error in the circumstances of this case; it 4 might have affected the jury's verdict.

5           Then the only remaining question in the Court of 6 Appeals' analysis was whether the decisions in which the 7 D.C. Circuit recognized these errors in the standard jury 8 instructions should be applied retroactively, and the court 9 held, relying on Hankerson v. North Carolina, that because 10 they relate to the jury's determination of factual guilt or 11 innocence, they do have to be applied retroactively.

12           Now, the decision, in our view, incorporates a 13 number of serious errors. To characterize its result, I 14 would say that first, it completely erases the distinction 15 between direct and collateral attack in the federal system.
16 Secondly, it renders the requirements of contemporaneous
17 objection in Rule 30 of the Federal Rules of Criminal 18 Procedure a dead letter. And it attaches to each new 19 decision altering the Rules of Evidence or the proper form 20 of jury instructions the consequence of invalidating large 21 numbers of prior convictions obtained before the new 22 decision was handed down.

23           Before I address the questions that the court of 24 appeals addressed, I'd like to pause for a moment on the 25 question of whether this is a constitutional or a

1 non-constitutional error. This is something of a morass and 2 I'm not sure that I understand it totally, but it is 3 significant because if it's not a constitutional error, then 4 the failure to raise this point on appeal would appear to 5 foreclose the issue under this Court's holding in Sunal v.
6 Large.

7           Secondly, if it's not a constitutional error,
8 while that does not absolutely foreclose relief under 2255,
9 the standard announced in Davis two is that you must have a 10 fundamental defect inherently resulting in a complete 11 miscarriage of justice. Now, that standard, it seems to me, 12 must be different from the harmless error standard that the 13 court of appeals effectively applied in this case.

14           Indeed, if the error is non-constitutional, it 15 seems to me that the decision of the court of appeals, 16 recognizing the error, is not significantly different from a 17 statute that would be passed by Congress to correct what it 18 viewed as an improper jury instruction, and I don't think 19 anybody could seriously contend that if Congress had passed 20 a statute in 1967, that Frady would be able to come in and 21 invoke that statute as grounds for collateral relief.

22           Now, I think the error here was not of 23 constitutional magnitude, and in this connection it seems to 24 me that the important case is Sandstrom, but what is 25 instructive is the contrast between Sandstrom and the 1 present case.

2           In Sandstrom, the issue was whether the defendant, 3 who admitted killing the victim, had intended to kill the 4 victim. And the principal difficulty that the court found
5 in the instruction which was a focal instruction in the case
6 was that it may have caused reasonable jurors to believe 7 that if his actions were such as would be likely to bring 8 about death, then they must find Sandstrom guilty, no matter 9 what they felt about his own state of mind.

10           Now, many of the cases of this court, Cupp v.
11 Naughten, Henerson v. Kibbe, United States v. Park, in 12 discussing instructions, enjoin the examination of the 13 instruction in the entire context. And without going into 14 it in detail here, there was a fairly lengthy instruction on 15 malice, and this instruction required the jury to find that 16 there was a feeling of hatred or ill will on the part of the 17 defendants. State of mind showing a hard regardless of 18 social duty, a mind deliberately bent on mischief and so on.

19           And in giving the Sandstrom instruction about the 20 presumption that one intends the natural and probable 21 consequences of his acts, the judge went on to say if a man 22 uses upon another an instrument of such a nature and in such 23 a way and under such circumstances that such use would 24 naturally and probably result in death, then you are not 25 compelled to presume that he intended to kill from such

1 acts, but has the right --

2 QUESTION: What are you arguing now, Mr. Frey, 3 that there's no constitutional error?

4 MR. FREY: I'm just making the point that in my 5 view -- and I'm going to pass on from this unless there are 6 any questions, this is not a constitutional error --

7 QUESTION: Oh, is that one of the questions you 8 brought up here?

9 MR. FREY: Well, I think it is built into the 10 question of what the standard --

11 QUESTION: Well, it isn't in so many words one of 12 the questions you listed, is it?

13 MR. FREY: No, we didn't list that as a question, 14 but I do think it is material to the Court's consideration 15 of whether the failure to object at trial and to raise the 16 issue on appeal, which is a question that we did present, 17 should bar review.

18 But let me move on to the question, if I may, of 19 whether plain error is the proper standard for review in a 20 collateral attack.

21 I think the court has made several fundamental 22 mistakes in reaching this conclusion. The first is that it
23 has turned the Davis case topsy-turvy, because what Davis 24 said is that --

25 QUESTION: Mr. Frey, I'm sorry, but you're leaving

1 the point that I don't think was entirely extraneous to your 2 plain error point, because it seems to me -- aren't you 3 saying that there must be constitutional error, and the mere 4 fact that there is plain non-constitutional error is not 5 sufficient ground for collateral attack?

6 MR. FREY: Except in the extraordinary case
7 outlined in Davis.

8 QUESTION: Unless it meets the fundamental impact 9 --

10 MR. FREY: And even then I'm not clear in light of 11 Sunal v. Large what effect the failure to appeal would have.

12 QUESTION: I want to be sure I grasp what you were 13 driving at. What you were saying is that this instruction 14 read in context, even if it might have been plain error in 15 the sense of reversible error, non-constitutional reasons, 16 nevertheless is not the kind of error that's open to review
17 on collateral attack.

18 MR. FREY: I think that is correct At least in --

19 QUESTION: Which would seem to me to be well 20 within your first question, if I understand the first 21 question.

22 MR. FREY: I believe it is. I wanted to make the 23 point, but I think --

24 QUESTION: It just wasn't one of the separate 25 question.

1           MR. FREY: It was not a separate question whether 2 it was a constitutional or a non-constitutional error. I 3 did want to make the point, but I do want to address the 4 question of whether plain error is the proper standard.

5           I will assume in the rest of my argument that this 6 is a constitutional error; that it doesn't matter whether or 7 not --

8           QUESTION: Are you going to assume that it's a 9 constitutional error that fundamentally tainted the trial, 10 and then the question is whether plain error, given those 11 facts, is --

12          MR. FREY: No, I'm not going to assume that it 13 fundamentally tainted the trial because I don't know exactly 14 what that means. I would rather cast it in a -- I will 15 assume that it is an error of a nature unlike the Fourth 16 Amendment suppression claim in Stone v. Powell that might be 17 cognizable in a collateral attack proceeding, and try to 18 address how the court should evaluate the failure of the 19 defendant to make an objection and take an appeal at the 20 time, and in that connection, whether the plain error 21 standard is the proper standard, and also --

22          QUESTION: Or Wainwright.

23          MR. FREY: Or the Wainwright cause and prejudice
24 standard. And secondly, if the cause and prejudice standard 25 is the proper standard, whether the assumed futility of 1 objection is a ground.

2           QUESTION: The reason I come back to this point is 3 that in the prior case, one of the arguments that was made 4 is that the Wainwright standard simply doesn't apply if the 5 error is sufficiently grave.

6           QUESTION: Well, that's what was held below, isn't 7 it?

8           MR. FREY: Well, what the court held below was 9 that Davis dictated the plain error standard in the federal 10 context, because Davis said that you would have no more 11 liberal access to collateral review than you would have to 12 review on direct appeal in the case of a procedural default, 13 and the court took that as a holding that you would have 14 equal access to collateral review or to direct review.

15           Now, the use of the plain error standard, as I 16 said, obliterates any distinction between collateral and 17 direct review, and this is the distinction that the court 18 has repeatedly recognized from Sunal v. Large if not 19 earlier, up to the Addonizio case a couple of terms ago.

20           The second thing is that obviously, the 21 consequences of applying the plain error rule on collateral 22 attack are far more sweeping in a case like this, 23 potentially hundreds of murder convictions are subject to 24 collateral attack under the decision of the court of 25 appeals. If you were confining it to cases on direct

1 appeal, you would have a much more limited impact.

2 Now, --

3 QUESTION: I take it that there's nothing about 4 52(b) on its face that would suggest a distinction, does 5 there, between direct review or collateral?

6 MR. FREY: It doesn't on its face say that it's 7 limited. However, --

8 QUESTION: Have we ever said so?

9 MR. FREY: I'm not aware that you have ever said 10 so, no.

11 QUESTION: Incidentally, this is a 2255 proceeding?

12 MR. FREY: Yes, it is.

13 QUESTION: And that's a civil action, isn't it?

14 MR. FREY: That's correct.

15 QUESTION: I mean not a civil action, I'm sorry.

16 MR. FREY: Well, for purposes --

17 QUESTION: It's a continuation of the criminal 18 case, isn't it?

19 MR. FREY: It's treated as civil for some 20 purposes, and it's part of a criminal case for other 21 purposes.

22 QUESTION: Is this for this purpose?

23 MR. FREY: Well, it's civil, for instance, for 24 purposes of the time limits for petitioners to certiorari 25 and the jurisdiction of this Court is civil.

1           QUESTION: But otherwise, hasn't it been regarded 2 as simply a continuation of the criminal case?

3           MR. FREY: Even if it's regarded as a continuation 4 of the criminal case, a kind of retrospective look at the 5 case, the question is what are the appropriate standards to 6 apply in making that look.

7           And I would make the point that the cause and 8 prejudice standard seems to me to be responsive to the issue 9 that's presented as to whether a procedural default should 10 or should not foreclose a claim on collateral attack.
11 Because it asks what are the state's interests in enforcing 12 a default, and what is the defendant's excuse for the 13 default. And that seems to me to be the proper inquiry to 14 be made.

15           Now, if I can turn to the question then of 16 presumed futility of objection as a proper showing of cause
17 under the cause and prejudice standard. This is the key 18 issue both here and in the previous case, and I think 19 underlying the viewpoint of those who find that futility of 20 objection should be cause is the view that it's not fair to 21 defendants and to their lawyers to expect them to anticipate 22 rulings that are not evident at the time of the trial.

23           Now, it has a certain superficial appeal, but it 24 does not seem to me to be justified on close analysis, and 25 of course, I remind the court, as counsel for Ohio says,

1 that the consequences of applying it in the collateral 2 attack context can be very grave indeed in terms of the 3 numbers of cases that would be affected.

4           Now, proper analysis of this issue seems to me to 5 require consideration of several subissues. The first 6 question is what constitutes futility; is it that the trial 7 court would likely reject the objection; is it that you have 8 no prospect of succeeding on appeal; is it that you have no
9 prospect in this court? I would say when you're dealing 10 with a federal law or constitutional issue, short of an 11 authoritative holding by this Court it seems to me difficult 12 to characterize any ruling as futile to object to.

13           The second question is, does it make any 14 difference whether the lawyer in this particular case
15 actually refrained from objecting on account of a judgment 16 that he made regarding futility. There's no evidence that 17 that was the basis for the failure to object in this case.

18           And there are two possibilities. One is to do 19 what the court of appeals did and presume that all lawyers 20 who didn't raise this objection did so because they thought 21 it would be futile, in which case many defendants will be 22 getting relief on a purely windfall basis totally unrelated 23 to the actual reason for the default. Or the alternative is 24 to conduct what will be, I think, a very difficult and 25 taxing inquiry into the lawyer's actual motives in not

1 making an objection to something that was potentially 2 objectionable.

3           Now let me turn to the next question which is, 4 does it matter whether the lawyer was right or wrong in his 5 decision that it would have been futile. In our view, the 6 respondent should not prevail in either case.

7           Let me say preliminarily that any assumption that 8 if the court of appeals indulged that respondent's counsel 9 was right in judging that it would have been futile to 10 object seems to me completely unsupportable because the 11 court of appeals, shortly thereafter, in fact observed on 12 its own these errors, and in the course of doing so it noted 13 that it must have been just a slip of tongue by the judge, 14 which surely would have been corrected if he had noted it.

15           Now, if the lawyer's assumption that it would be 16 futile to object was wrong, then it seems to me his mistake 17 is no different from many others that defense lawyers, being 18 human, make during the course of a criminal trial. For 19 example, the failure to call a helpful witness, the failure 20 to pursue a line of cross examination that would have been 21 useful, or many other things.

22           Now, the standard for assessing whether such 23 mistakes justify a new trial on collateral relief, I think,
24 is the Sixth Amendment of ineffective assistance of counsel
25 standard. And in response to the question that Justice

1 White asked during the last argument, my view is that it is 2 not, I think, correct to equate a mistake on the part of the 3 lawyer in raising a useful claim with ineffective assistance
4 of counsel. The mistake may be of such a magnitude and may 5 have such a fundamental effect in undermining the 6 defendant's prospects of success at trial and be so 7 prejudicial that in all the circumstances, the court will 8 judge it to be a constitutional violation.

9           In any event, my point here is simply that a 10 mistaken judgment about the futility of raising an objection 11 is really no different from any other kind of mistake that a 12 defense lawyer can make.

13           Now, I note in this connection that the 14 contemporaneous objection rule does perform a very important 15 function because by insisting on a contemporaneous 16 objection, you do improve the chance that the error will be 17 avoided or corrected at the trial, that it will not occur.

18           QUESTION: Well, this was the basis for the 19 decision Davis won, was it not? The language of 12(b)(2).

20           MR. FREY: Well, there was a statute that was 21 being interpreted, but that's the policy that underlies the 22 statute in large part.

23           QUESTION: Yes.

24           MR. FREY: Now, Davis one is different from this 25 case because it involved the grand jury question and had

1 nothing to do with the reliability of the guilt determining 2 process in the sense that this case arguably does. I assume 3 my brother will suggest that it has a substantial effect. I 4 don't agree, but --

5           QUESTION: But let's just assume for purposes of 6 history that you go from Davis one to Francis v. Henderson 7 to Wainwright v. Sykes, and you have specific language in 8 Davis one; it's carried over in Francis v. Henderson, and in 9 Wainwright v. Sykes it's perhaps elaborated on, but it 10 expresses more a feeling or mood rather than any precise 11 standard or any measurable thing as if it were dealing with 12 mathematical equations.

13           MR. FREY: But I think it does express a policy.
14 It doesn't explain what cause means and what prejudice
15 means, but it certainly reflects a policy which this Court 16 has adopted, that there has to be an excuse for a procedural 17 default before the habeas corpus defendant will be allowed 18 to come in and seek relief. He has to justify it.

19           That's what we're talking about now; is what 20 constitutes this sufficient justification. And I have 21 indicated that in my view, a mistaken belief that it would 22 be futile to object cannot possibly be a sufficient 23 justification.

24           So let's now turn to the perhaps more difficult 25 question; that is, assuming that the lawyer is right in his

1 view that that objection would be futile, whatever is 2 necessary to satisfy that -- let's say the situation in 3 Sunal v. Large where the appellate Second Circuit had 4 definitively rejected claims by other defendants, and this 5 Court had denied certiorari on those claims. So let us say, 6 if it can ever be said, that the lawyer is correct in 7 assuming futility. Nevertheless, substantial reasons exist 8 for enforcing the procedural default and for not treating 9 this accurate assessment of futility as cause.

10           First of all, I come back to the consequences of a 11 rule that does treat it as cause whenever you have a change 12 in the law. Whenever you have a change in the law with 13 regard to a proper instruction, with regard to a commonly 14 occurring evidentiary ruling, with regard to any of the 15 things that may come up at trial with some frequency, the 16 effect of saying that the lawyer couldn't have known that 17 the law would change and therefore, everybody who had this 18 issue treated adversely to them in their trial is entitled 19 to collateral relief is quite substantial.

20           And that, I think, was the point of footnote 8 in 21 Hankerson. It was an effort to confine this effect, while 22 still recognizing the retroactivity that people who had felt 23 the claim was important enough that they were going to raise 24 it and try to insist upon it and try to get it litigated, 25 the court felt it was not fair to deprive them of the 1 benefit, but the people who didn't, this was a limiting 2 principle that I think makes a lot of sense.

3           Secondly, if you are going to say that there is no
4 penalty attached to the default, that if a lawyer looks at a 5 particular issue that he might raise and says there's no
6 point in my raising it, therefore I won't, and if it's all 7 right for him to say that and he has full access to 8 collateral attack when somebody else does raise it and does 9 prevail, you've removed the incentives to counsel for 10 raising claims that may bring about improvements in the law.

11           In fact, if somebody who raised it, as in Davis 12 two, and lost -- if somebody who raised it and lost might be 13 foreclosed on the ground of law of the case, but somebody 14 who didn't raise it would have access to collateral relief, 15 you would actually have created some disincentives to 16 raising claims like this.

17           Another point about the contemporaneous objection 18 rule and the reliance on the default as a ground for 19 foreclosing access to collateral relief, is that a 20 contemporaneous objection is one of the best ways we have of 21 judging whether the issue was important to the defense in 22 the context of the particular case. It seems to me that the 23 court cannot indulge the assumption that every potential 24 issue that was in a case on which the law at some time in 25 the future changes, indulge the assumption that that was

1 important to the defendant and justifies giving him
2 collateral relief, even though he didn't say a peep about it 3 at trial and he didn't raise it on appeal.

4           Now, if I can sum up, the issue here is a balance
5 between the interests of our system in finality in criminal 6 cases against the concern in our system that substantial 7 injustice not be done, that innocent defendants not be 8 incarcerated. These are important values, and obviously, we 9 don't insist on the same degree of finality in criminal 10 cases that we do in civil cases.

11           Nevertheless, it does remain of significant value 12 in our system and the court has often recognized it, and 13 it's not to be overridden lightly, but only when there are 14 compelling justifications for such an action. This is so 15 even when the defendant and his attorney are not at all 16 blameworthy with respect to some error at trial. And I
17 think I can best illustrate this point for you by reference 18 to the treatment of motions for a new trial on the basis of 19 newly discovered evidence.

20           If you have newly discovered evidence which raises 21 some question about the defendant's guilt; that is, it might 22 have affected the outcome of the trial, there are two points
23 to notice about it. First of all, if the lawyer did not 24 exercise due diligence in discovering this evidence, even 25 though the client is in no way to blame for this, relief of

1 new trial is foreclosed for the lack of due diligence. This 2 is to ensure that the trial itself is the main event, as the 3 court said in Wainwright, and not a tryout on the road.

4           That is analogous to the lawyer who mistakenly 5 thinks that an objection would be futile.

6           Now, even where the newly discovered evidence 7 could not have been found in the exercise of due diligence, 8 and the defendant and his lawyer are therefore in no way to 9 be blamed, the witness comes back from Tibet and suddenly 10 discloses information, we don't apply a standard like the 11 court of appeals applied in this case that if it might have 12 affected the trial; the standard that is applied is that it 13 would have to probably have resulted in an acquittal before 14 a new trial is granted.

15           Now, this may seem harsh, but it is the 16 accommodation that our system makes between two competing 17 important interests; the interest in finality and the 18 interest in not incarcerating innocent defendants.

19           If the Court accepts the reasoning of the D.C.
20 Circuit in this case, there is no balance struck between 21 those interests; there is no value afforded to finality in 22 criminal cases. There is nothing but a harmless error 23 inquiry in every case when a defendant comes up with some 24 new principle or some new fact which he can call to the 25 Court's attention years and years later.

1 I'd like to reserve the balance of my time for 2 rebuttal if there are no further questions.

3 ORAL ARGUMENT OF DANIEL M. SCHEMBER, ESQ.

4 ON BEHALF OF RESPONDENT

5 MR. SCHEMBER: Mr. Justice Brennan, and may it
6 please the Court:

7 The government has briefed this case as if Mr.
8 Frady were a federal prisoner convicted of a federal offense 9 and who has filed a post-conviction relief motion raising 10 only federal issues. All three of those premises are false, 11 and the government completely overlooks this aspect of the 12 case.

13 Mr. Frady is a District of Columbia prisoner. He 14 was convicted of a local crime. His motion for 15 post-conviction relief raised instruction errors which said, 16 in effect, that the instructions given at the trial 17 improperly informed the jury as to what the government had 18 to prove in order to establish the elements of the offense 19 of first degree murder.

20 He also raised the claim that these instructions 21 were also erroneous under Mullaney and Sandstrom, the 22 constitutional issue.

23 QUESTION: You say he raised these at the trial?

24 MR. SCHEMBER: No, I'm referring, Your Honor, to 25 his post-conviction relief petition.

1           Now, the federal district court in the District of 2 Columbia and the court of appeals, they sit in a unique 3 jurisdiction, and this case dates from a time period when 4 the federal court in the District of Columbia served as both 5 a local court and the federal court, exercising both Article 6 I and Article III power.

7           In hearing the post-conviction relief petition, 8 the district court was exercising a remaining vestige of 9 that Article I power which was not taken away in 1970 when 10 most of that power was transferred to the superior court.

11           In this circumstance, where you have a D.C.
12 prisoner convicted solely of a D.C. offense prior to the 13 Court Reform Act, having to come back to the court which 14 sentenced him, as 2255 says, with a claim that his 15 conviction is improper under District of Columbia law and 16 that's the only forum he can go to to make that claim, the 17 district court has an obligation to afford relief if 18 District of Columbia law in fact affords relief.

19           This was the basic premise of the court of 20 appeals' reliance on the Green and Wharton cases, the 21 primary precedents which the court invoked to grant relief 22 in this case. Green and Wharton involved the two 23 instructions that were involved in the Frady case, and --

24           QUESTION: You don't deny, do you, that it was a
25 2255 proceeding?

1                   MR. SCHEMBER: Yes, it was, Your Honor. 2255
2 applies to any prisoner who was sentenced by a court created
3 by act of Congress. Therefore, it applies to Mr. Frady.
4 2255 then tells the prisoner what court you have to go to,
5 and 2255 says it's the sentencing court. The sentencing
6 court in this case was the United States District Court.
7 Why was the United States District Court the sentencing
8 court in this purely local case? It was the sentencing 9 court because this case arose prior to the Court Reform Act 10 of 1970. Prior to that time, the U.S. District Court had 11 jurisdiction to try all local felonies, and served in that 12 capacity as both a local court and a federal court in a 13 similar manner as the federal courts throughout the country.

14                   It is for that particular reason that this case, 15 which contains both federal constitutional issues and local 16 issues, finds it way back into the United States District
17 Court.

18                   The cases relied upon --

19                   QUESTION: Are you going to argue that for that 20 reason the contours of the 2255 proceeding differ, to the 21 extent that there are local issues or issues of local law as 22 to which there were errors? Is that it?

23                   MR. SCHEMBER: My contention, Mr. Justice Brennan, 24 is that in a case such as this kind, a unique case which 25 only arises because of this unique circumstances and in a

1 few years we won't have anymore cases of this kind due to 2 the passage of time and the fact that the Court Reform Act 3 was passed in 1970, my contention is that 2255 states that 4 the forum in which a pre-Court Reform Act prisoner must seek 5 relief is the United States District Court because that's 6 the sentencing court.

7           QUESTION: What I'm trying to get at is how does 8 that differ -- how does that change the issues that this 9 case presents from a 2255 and some other federal district --

10           MR. SCHEMBER: 2255 affords relief for prisoners 11 incarcerated in violation of the Constitution and laws of 12 the United States, and it also provides relief in cases that 13 are otherwise subject to collateral attack.

14           A case of a D.C. prisoner in federal court here in 15 the District of Columbia because of this unique circumstance 16 is properly there under 2255, and if --

17           QUESTION: I don't suggest the government to 18 suggest that the case wasn't properly there, this 2255
19 proceeding is properly there.

20           MR. SCHEMBER: No. The point is can claims under 21 local law be made there.

22           QUESTION: That's what I'm trying to get at. What 23 claims under local law are here in addition to the federal 24 Constitutional claims?

25           MR. SCHEMBER: The claim that the instructions

1 were plain error; that the instructions were erroneous 2 because the jury was not properly informed as to what the 3 prosecution had to prove to establish the elements of this 4 D.C. offense.

5 QUESTION: And are you saying that's an error of 6 local law?

7 MR. SCHEMBER: yes, Your Honor.

8 QUESTION: Although it might also be an error of 9 constitutional dimensions?

10 MR. SCHEMBER: That's correct, Your Honor.

11 QUESTION: But the same error would be both. Is 12 that it?

13 MR. SCHEMBER: Yes, Your Honor.

14 QUESTION: All right.

15 MR. SCHEMBER: We maintain that under the Green 16 and Wharton cases, which are valid local precedents; they 17 are decisions --

18 QUESTION: You're saying then that the scope of 19 review under 2255 is broader in the District of Columbia 20 than it is in any other federal court.

21 MR. SCHEMBER: That is, in effect, the case, Your 22 Honor.

23 QUESTION: What if it came up in a federal enclave
24 conviction?

25 MR. SCHEMBER: Are you referring to --

1               QUESTION: In the assimilated crimes, military 2 reservations.

3               MR. SCHEMBER: Well, under the Assimilative Crimes
4 Act, essentially that act federalizes local offenses and 5 makes them a federal offense under the Assimilative Crimes
6 Act. That's not what's going on here. This is a District 7 of Columbia offense, and it's tried as a District of 8 Columbia case, and it is in -- it was in federal court in 9 1963 solely because at that time the U.S. District Court for 10 the District of Columbia had unique jurisdiction, unique in 11 this country, to try local and federal offenses.

12              QUESTION: Mr. Schember, is this something like 13 that if there's an error of district law, entirely apart 14 from whether or not the error might also be of 15 constitutional dimensions, that in effect, if the court of 16 appeals rested its judgment on the reparation of an error of 17 district law, that's like a state court deciding a case on a 18 state ground and therefore, it's none of our business here 19 to review it?

20              MR. SCHEMBER: That's my contention, Your Honor.
21 That this decision of the United States Court of Appeals 22 rests on an adequate independent ground of District of 23 Columbia law. That is reflected in the Green and Wharton 24 decisions upon which the court relied in reaching its result.

25              QUESTION: But those decisions just go to whether

1 the instruction was error. They are not local law decision 2 saying the scope of review under 2255 is plain error, are 3 they?

4 MR. SCHEMBER: They are local decisions in the 5 sense that they were decided prior to February 1, 1971, --

6 QUESTION: But they don't go to the question of 7 what is the scope of review on collateral attack, do they?

8 MR. SCHEMBER: They do not expressly address that 9 question, of course, because they were --

10 QUESTION: They established the fact that these 11 instructions were erroneous as a matter of District of 12 Columbia law.

13 MR. SCHEMBER: That's correct.

14 QUESTION: But that still leaves open the question 15 whether on collateral attack in the District of Columbia or 16 anywhere else in the federal system, the federal court may 17 review a matter of local law.

18 MR. SCHEMBER: I turn to that question next.
19 Indeed, that was the question that the U.S. Court of Appeals 20 had to decide, or the district court as well. Here, the 21 court was presented with a District of Columbia case with a 22 District of Columbia error in it, and the question is can 23 the U.S. Court of Appeals grant relief in the 2255
24 proceeding?

25 Our contention here is that since the 2255

1 proceeding is the only avenue open to the prisoner in this 2 situation, that as a matter of equal protection the United 3 States Court of Appeals and the district court has to afford 4 relief that would have been available -- that is available
5 under District of Columbia law and would have been afforded 6 had this case not been a pre-1970 case, but --

7           QUESTION: Well, equal protection with what?
8 Comparing this litigant with what other litigant who's being 9 treated more --

10           MR. SCHEMBER: The other category of litigants 11 would be those tried and convicted of murder with these 12 erroneous instructions in the Superior Court of the District 13 of Columbia.

14           QUESTION: Well, they couldn't have collateral
15 attack if this is not the right rule.

16           MR. SCHEMBER: They could very well, Your Honor.
17 That is the point of our brief. Under the District of 18 Columbia law, the failure of the prisoner to have raised the 19 instruction errors at trial, or on direct appeal, does not 20 constitute a waiver of the error. It changes the standard 21 of review, of course, to plain error due to the operation of 22 Rule 30 and there's an analogous Rule 30 in the District of 23 Columbia, but --

24           QUESTION: Isn't there any collateral review for a 25 District of Columbia prisoner other than under 2255?

1 MR. SCHEMBER: Yes, there is, Your Honor. If that 2 prisoner was sentenced in a District of Columbia court, then 3 the proceeding --

4 QUESTION: What's his collateral relief?

5 MR. SCHEMBER: There's a statute created by the 6 Court Reform Act --

7 QUESTION: No, are we talking about since the 8 Reform Act?

9 MR. SCHEMBER: Pardon me, Your Honor?

10 QUESTION: Are we talking about the situation
11 since the Reform Act?

12 MR. SCHEMBER: That's correct, Your Honor.

13 QUESTION: I gather of course these felonies, 14 District of Columbia felonies, are tried in the Superior 15 Court, are they not?

16 MR. SCHEMBER: Yes, sir.

17 QUESTION: And then if there is to be collateral 18 relief, there's a special statute, you're telling me?

19 MR. SCHEMBER: That's correct, Your Honor.

20 QUESTION: And if there's a determination that 21 there has been some kind of error of District of Columbia
22 law, then there's no review in this Court?

23 MR. SCHEMBER: The question of the degree of the 24 review of a District of Columbia Court of Appeals decision
25 under the District of Columbia collateral attack statute, I

1 believe has not been raised in this Court as to the scope of 2 the review.

3 QUESTION: What's your suggestion? Do we have to 4 review cases like that? Say no.

5 MR. SCHEMBER: Your Honor, the closest thing
6 you've had I believe would be the Palmore case and Swaine v.
7 Presley.

8 QUESTION: Palmore was nothing like this.

9 MR. SCHEMBER: No, it is not, Your Honor. You
10 haven't faced this issue precisely. My suggestion would be 11 that the intent of the Court Reform Act was to make the 12 District of Columbia Court of Appeals the highest court of 13 the jurisdiction --

14 QUESTION: So in other words, to treat this kind 15 of case where it's purely District of Columbia law, exactly 16 as we're required to treat a state supreme court case.

17 MR. SCHEMBER: Absolutely, that is my contention.
18 And it is simply because the U.S. Court of Appeals and the 19 U.S. District Court have this remaining vestige of Article I 20 jurisdiction stemming from this earlier period --

21 QUESTION: Did the Court of Appeals suggest at all 22 that it was applying local law?

23 MR. SCHEMBER: It did so indeed by relying upon 24 its own precedents, Green and Wharton, which --

25 QUESTION: Did it do so explicitly, or did it

1 purport to apply general federal law?1

2 MR. SCHEMBER: It expressly relied on Green and 3 Wharton.

4 QUESTION: But those were decided before the Court
5 Reform Act.

6 MR. SCHEMBER: Yes, they were. And as such, they 7 are valid precedents of local law, since they were decided 8 -- the date is a little bit different for that issue. Since 9 those cases were decided prior to February 1, 1971, and 10 since they resolved local issues, they are valid local 11 precedents. Until the District of Columbia Court of Appeals 12 expressly overrules, which of course it has not.

13 QUESTION: Yes, but in the section of the opinion 14 dealing with the standard of review, they didn't cite those 15 cases; they relied on Davis, Fay v. Noia and Rule 30 and 16 Rule 52(b).

17 MR. SCHEMBER: Those cases were indeed cited.

18 QUESTION: They're the only cases cited. The 19 cases that you're relying on are on the question of whether 20 there was error; not in the part of the opinion dealing with 21 the scope of review.

22 MR. SCHEMBER: That's correct, Mr. Justice
23 Stevens. What I am maintaining in this Court is that when 24 the federal district courts in the District of Columbia are 25 faced with a situation of this kind, as a matter of equal

1 protection they must grant relief --

2           QUESTION: Well, equal protection with what? Many 3 state collateral review systems do not allow review of a 4 matter that would just be raisable on direct appeal. They 5 have a similar standard to the 2255 standard, fundamental 6 error, constitutional error and that sort of thing.

7           MR. SCHEMBER: That's correct, sir. However, 8 examination of District of Columbia law indicates that 9 relief is not foreclosed due to failure to raise the issue.

10          QUESTION: What is the District of Columbia case
11 on which you rely for this proposition?

12          MR. SCHEMBER: Your Honor, a series of cases
13 culminating in the Hargett decision. The Hargett decision 14 stated that -- well, I have to back up. The Atkinson case 15 is cited by both the government and Mr. Frady, and the 16 Atkinson case basically held that collateral relief is 17 available for issues not raised on direct appeal under 18 exceptional circumstances.

19          Then the Hargett case, a District of Columbia 20 Court of Appeals decision, held that exceptional 21 circumstances exist when there's been a denial of a basic 22 right not limited to constitutional rights. It is clear 23 under District of Columbia law, that the failure to object
24 to instructional errors at trial and the failure to appeal
25 on those issues does not constitute a procedural forfeiture

1 constituting a waiver. So long as you can show that there
2 was a denial of a basic right, not necessarily a
3 constitutional right, District of Columbia law affords 4 relief and does not place a procedural bar to reaching the 5 merits and obtaining relief.

6 QUESTION: Well what, in this case, is your 7 submission, was the fundamental right under district law
8 that was denied Frady?

9 MR. SCHEMBER: The right to have the jury properly 10 instructed as to the government's burden of proof to 11 establish the offense of murder. There were three 12 instructional errors in this case; the Mullaney error is 13 here, the Sandstrom error is here and the effect of these 14 multiple instruction errors was to essentially relieve --

15 QUESTION: Well, has that kind of error been held 16 to be fundamental error as a matter of District of Columbia 17 law?

18 MR. SCHEMBER: They are -- well, they have been 19 held fundamental errors under United States constitutional 20 law in Mullaney and Sandstrom, and certainly -- and they 21 were held erroneous under Green and Wharton, and Green and 22 Wharton are valid local precedents because they were decided 23 prior to February 1, 1971.

24 QUESTION: Do they deal with errors found to be 25 fundamental?

1           MR. SCHEMBER: They dealt with the very errors
2 involved in this case.

3           The question that the U.S. Court of Appeals faced 4 in light of its prior precedents in Green and Wharton, which 5 were direct appeal cases, was whether the degree of 6 prejudice of this type of error, recognized to be plain 7 error in Green and Wharton, was sufficient to warrant relief
8 on collateral attack.

9           There is recognition in District of Columbia law
10 that direct appeal and collateral attack are not the same 11 thing. But the difference lies not in whether a forfeiture 12 or waiver exists, but in the degree of prejudice that must 13 be shown.

14           Now, I have to admit --

15           QUESTION: Counsel, even if you are correct and 16 you're examining the question from the standpoint of 17 prejudice, as I understand it, Mr. Frady asserted he wasn't 18 even around at the time of the trial. He wasn't even 19 there. And yet, you have a jury that found on the facts 20 first degree murder. There wasn't even a need to deal with 21 inferred malice, was there? How was he possibly prejudiced 22 under the facts of this case where he says he wasn't even 23 there. And yet, the jury found he was and found the 24 evidence to support first degree murder?

25           MR. SCHEMBER: Well, Your Honor has eloquently

1 stated an argument that many judges that have reviewed this 2 case have made. Other judges have taken the opposing view, 3 and I think for this reason.

4           It is true that the malice -- in light of the 5 defense, the third man defense, I was not there; it was 6 someone else who did it -- as to that specific defense, that 7 was raised by the defense. No, the malice instructions 8 cannot be deemed to be prejudicial to that defense.

9           But the fact that that was one of the theories 10 that the defense urged does not mean that that relieves the 11 government of the burden of proving malice. And the 12 government's case, the government's evidence here fairly 13 raised the question whether this was murder or manslaughter, 14 as the trial judge so held. And I would note that the trial 15 judge was hardly receptive to this collateral relief motion, 16 but nonetheless at the trial had held that malice is an 17 issue. Manslaughter is an issue, and gave an instruction on 18 manslaughter.

19           On direct appeal, one judge of the court of 20 appeals held that the evidence of pre-meditation and 21 deliberation, viewed in the light most favorable to the 22 government, was insufficient as a matter of law. Other 23 judges disagreed.

24           On collateral attack, again the issue of prejudice 25 came up; again, the question of what is the evidence of

1 malice, is it clear, is it not clear, and the panel held
2 below that the evidence of malice was equivocal. On en banc
3 review there was quite blistering dissent by other members, 4 but the net result was that the court of appeals as a whole 5 sustained the judgment of the panel, that there was 6 sufficient doubt as to the evidence of malice to render 7 multiple instruction errors on that issue sufficiently 8 prejudicial to warrant relief in this case.

9           Now, the question becomes what should this Court 10 do in light of this divergence of opinion on this kind of 11 assessment of the facts and assessment of the evidence. I 12 suggest that the Court take guidance from its decision in 13 the Fisher case. This is a District of Columbia case, it's 14 a local case, and the judgments of the judges of the 15 District of Columbia Circuit exercising the remaining 16 vestige of their Article I jurisdiction should be deferred 17 to on a question of this kind.

18           I admit there has been sharp division of opinion
19 on the question, but I would submit that under the Fisher 20 case cited in our brief, that it is not appropriate for this 21 Court --

22           QUESTION: Do we have an intimation that they 23 thought, that the majority thought they were exercising 24 their remaining vestige of their Article I jurisdiction?

25           MR. SCHEMBER: You have to pull it out of the 1 opinion. I admit that. But it is very direct in the fact 2 that they relied on their own precedents of Green and 3 Wharton. The government concedes those are 4 non-constitutional precedents, and if they are not decisions 5 under constitutional law, what are they?

6           They are decisions under District of Columbia law, 7 holding that the instructions given did not properly inform 8 the jury as to what the government had to prove to establish 9 the District of Columbia offense of murder. And that, Your 10 Honor, is a local question. And that was the basis for the 11 holdings in Green and Wharton, and Green and Wharton were 12 the cases that the Frady court relied upon in granting 13 relief in this case.

14           The question that the government raises in their 15 petition asks this Court to hold that a procedural default 16 did occur, though District of Columbia law says one did not, 17 and that the issue is absolutely waived. Where does this 18 waiver come from? Rule 30 does not impose a waiver because 19 all Rule 30 does is change the standard of review from 20 normal allegation of error to plain error. It's not a 21 procedural forfeiture.

22           This Court has recognized that principle in the 23 Namet case. This Court has also recognized that the mere 24 failure to appeal does not result in a procedural default 25 changing the standard of review on collateral attack.

1 That's clear from Fay v. Noia, that's clear from Kaufman v.
2 United States, that's clear from Humphrey v. Cady. All 3 cases in which this Court has held that the mere failure to 4 appeal does not by itself carry implications for the 5 standard of review on collateral attack.

6 QUESTION: How much of Kaufman do you think is 7 left after Stone v. Powell?

8 MR. SCHEMBER: At least the proposition that 9 failure to appeal by itself does not impose a procedural 10 default changing the standard of review on collateral 11 attack. That principle was reaffirmed in Humphrey v. Cady, 12 Your Honor. And it is also implicit in Fay v. Noia, and 13 that indeed is what is also left of Fay v. Noia, I would 14 maintain.

15 So if we have a situation where failure to object 16 at trial merely changes the standard of review to plain 17 error, and failure to appeal does not change the standard of 18 review at all, how can the government leap to the conclusion 19 the failure to raise the instruction error at trial somehow 20 triggers the cause and prejudice standard when the issue is 21 first raised on collateral attack?

22 Where the court came to that conclusion in 23 previous decision was from the express provisions of Rule 12 24 in the Davis case, which expressly applied the standard of 25 cause and prejudice to the error raised there. And the

1 court extended that principle in Wainwright v. Sykes and 2 Francis v. Henderson where the state courts had held a 3 procedural default to have existed, and held the claim 4 absolutely barred.

5           There, this Court, as a matter of comity and 6 respect for the state court rulings held that well, if the 7 states are going to hold the claim absolutely barred, we 8 will at least require a showing of cause and a demonstration 9 of prejudice, a lesser standard of review than the state 10 court imposed in those cases.

11           QUESTION: Incidentally, Mr. Schember, I take it 12 all of the rule governing 2255 actions, even as to the 13 District of Columbia errors that you mentioned in your 14 submission, would apply, wouldn't they? For example, Rule 15 12, isn't it, of the 2255 rules gives the reviewing court an 16 option to take either the criminal Rules of Procedure or the 17 civil, whichever are the more appropriate.

18           MR. SCHEMBER: That's correct.

19           QUESTION: And here I gather the court of appeals
20 picked out 52(b) of the Rules of Criminal Procedure, didn't 21 they?

22           MR. SCHEMBER: Yes, Your Honor, that's correct.

23           QUESTION: Do you rely on that at all as a 24 latitude which Rule 12 of 2255 gives the court of appeals?

25           MR. SCHEMBER: I would say it was certainly

1 correct for the U.S. Court of Appeals to look to Rule 52(b)
2 of the Criminal Rules in determining the proper standard of 3 review.

4           QUESTION: Well, that's what it did. They just 5 selected that one, did it not, as the proper standard here?
6 Plain error standard.

7           MR. SCHEMBER: Yes, it did, Your Honor, and I
8 would supports its analysis. It is clear that the analysis 9 that the court of appeals needed to go through was to say 10 all right, there appear to have been two procedural 11 failings; one, a failure to appeal. Does that affect the 12 standard of review? Humphrey v. Cady, Kaufman, Fay v. Noia, 13 they say no.

14           Well, there was another procedural failing. There 15 was a failure to object at trial. Well, what's the 16 consequence of that? Well, 52(b) says the consequence of 17 that is to change the standard of review to plain error and 18 analyzing the case under that standard, the court of appeals 19 granted relief and properly so.

20           In summation, I do maintain that since District of 21 Columbia law affords relief here, the decision of the U.S.
22 Court of Appeals rests on an adequate independent ground of 23 local law and must be affirmed on that basis.

24           But second, even if this Court reaches the 25 question that the government has raised in its petition, the 1 application of the cause and prejudice standard here is 2 entirely inappropriate since the application of that 3 standard is premised on a finding of a procedural default 4 which normally bars the claim. And since that is not the 5 case with instructional errors, it would be inappropriate 6 for the Court to extend Davis, Wainwright v. Sykes and 7 Francis v. Henderson to this kind of instructional error, 8 which the Court --

9           QUESTION: Let me ask you one more question about 10 your local law argument. Although the cases, the D.C.
11 cases, allowing collateral attack for plain error as a 12 matter of local law, which you cite in your brief, do 13 certainly support that proposition, the way they state the 14 plain error standard in the quote on page 9 of your brief is 15 under the plain error standard apparently in the District, 16 "the error complained of must be so clearly prejudicial to 17 substantial rights as to jeopardize the very fairness and 18 integrity of the trial."

19           Now, when you state it that way, it's pretty much 20 like the 2255 standard, isn't it?

21           MR. SCHEMBER: Your Honor, the ultimate standard
22 under District of Columbia law is whether there is a 23 probability of a miscarriage of justice. I would note that 24 the U.S. Court of Appeals in the Frady decision invoked that 25 very standard and held that on the facts of this case, these

1 instructional errors created a probability of a miscarriage
2 of justice because they meant that Mr. Frady may have been 3 improperly convicted of murder when he was only guilty of 4 manslaughter.

5           Now, this was the point that I was discussing 6 previously; there is division of opinion among the judges as 7 to whether in fact the evidence in this case on the question 8 of malice is such that there was sufficient prejudice to 9 warrant relief under that kind of a miscarriage of justice 10 standard. That is a question which is nicely balanced among 11 the judges, and under the Fisher case should not be 12 disturbed by this Court.

13           JUSTICE BRENNAN: You have three minutes, Mr Frey.

14           ORAL ARGUMENT OF ANDREW L. FREY, ESQ.

15           ON BEHALF OF THE PETITIONER - Rebuttal

16           MR. FREY: Thank you, Mr. Justice Brennan.

17           Let me start off by putting out to Mr. Justice 18 Stevens that the case that you were looking at was a direct 19 review case. We have addressed this question of local law, 20 which I think is a complete red herring, in our reply 21 brief. Let me just say that first of all, there is nothing 22 in the opinion of the Court of Appeals in this case that 23 remotely suggests that they would apply a different rule if 24 this case had arisen as a result of a murder on the Capitol 25 grounds or some other federal enclave in the District of 1 Columbia.

2           Secondly, there is nothing in the decisions of the 3 local courts that remotely suggests that they would excuse a 4 procedural default on collateral attack. What there is are 5 decisions are saying that they are going to strictly enforce 6 procedural defaults on direct appeal, and only consider 7 under the plain error standard a very limited category of 8 cases. It is difficult, I think impossible, to convert that 9 into an understanding that they would be very liberal with 10 such claims on collateral attack.

11           Now, with regard to the question that Mr. Justice
12 Brennan asked whether this is like an adequate state ground 13 claim, it is not like an adequate state ground claim because 14 the District of Columbia courts are not state courts, and in 15 fact, the United States Supreme Court is the highest 16 expositor of District of Columbia law, even local law
17 questions, as I learned somewhat to my chagrin in the Whalen
18 case a few years ago --

19           QUESTION: But there are a number of our cases, 20 aren't there, Mr. Frey, which have suggested a reluctance to 21 review pure questions of District of Columbia law?

22           MR. FREY: Well, but as I say, the last --

23           QUESTION: Well, Miller and United States, Fisher
24 and a number of others --

25           MR. FREY: There are cases, Southall Realty. But

1 in Whalen there was no reluctance to review a purely local 2 law question. The point is you can review it.

3 In this case I don't think it's material because --

4 QUESTION: Well, nothing I said suggests that we 5 can't review it.

6 MR. FREY: No, I understand that, but I'm just 7 saying --

8 QUESTION: But we've been very reluctant to.

9 MR. FREY: I'm just saying it is a little 10 different from an independent state ground question.

11 Now, on the question of harmless error, the 12 question that Justice O'Connor asked, I do think that it may 13 have been that if this objection had been preserved at trial
14 and raised on direct appeal, there would be arguably be a 15 close question I think as to whether the error would be 16 harmless and the conviction ought nevertheless to be 17 affirmed.

18 The instruction on manslaughter was given because 19 there was some evidence which the jury might not have 20 credited about premeditation involving the driving by the 21 premises beforehand, the picking up and putting on gloves 22 before they went into the premises, the conversation at the 23 restaurant and so on.

24 Now, let me close on the question of futility and 25 the point about the effect of a failure to appeal. I don't

1 often quote Justice Douglas but in this case I think his 2 words in Sunal v. Large are appropriate.

3           He discussed the question of assumed futility and 4 he said he did not think -- I see my time is up, so you can 5 read it for yourselves. Thank you.

6           JUSTICE BRENNAN: Thank you, gentlemen, the case
7 is submitted.

8           (Whereupon, at 3:00 p.m. the oral argument in the 9 above-entitled matter ceased.)
