2 CHIEF JUSTICE BURGER: Mr. Gardner, I think
3 you may proceed whenever you're ready now.

4 ORAL ARGUMENT OF WARNER W. GARDNER, ESQ.,
5 ON BEHALF OF THE PETITIONER

6 MR. GARDNER: Mr. Chief Justice, and may it
7 please the Court:

8 This case involves the crash of a C-5A
9 aircraft which was delivered to the Air Force by 10 Lockheed in September of 1970. In March of 1975 the 11 plane was stationed at the Travis Air Force Base in 12 California. On March the 16th it was cannibalized and 13 two tie rods were removed for the benefit of another
14 plane. Eight days later the tie rods -- other tie rods 15 were replaced.

16 At the time the rigging of the lock which held 17 the aft cargo ramp was not fully rigged. On April the 18 1st the plane left Travis, went to Georgia where it 19 picked up 50 tones of howitzers. From there it went to 20 Saigon with some trans-Pacific way stops and arrived at 21 noon on April the 5th, 1975. That was one or two days
22 before the final fall of Saigon.

23 Within a space of three hours the howitzers 24 were unloaded and 301 passengers somehow put aboard the 25 plane, most of whom were Vietnamese orphans. Shortly

1 after takeoff the locking mechanism on the door to the 2 aft cargo ramp gave way. The ramp fell, severing the 3 control lines of the plane. In an unsuccessful effort
4 to regain the Saigon airport it crashed with heavy loss 5 of life and injury to almost all of those who survived.

6 Several hundred product liability suits were 7 filed against Lockheed. They were consolidated by the 8 Multidistrict Panel in the District of Columbia courts 9 here. In each case Lockheed joined the United States as 10 third party defendant.

11 After extensive discovery, the United States
12 and Lockheed produced an agreed statement of material
13 facts and further agreed between themselves upon a 14 percentage division of any recovery. That last 15 agreement reserved, however, the rights of the United 16 States under the so-called exclusive liability 17 provisions of the Federal Employees' Compensation Act in 18 respect of civilian government employees.

19 There were about 33 suits filed involving 20 civilian government employees. This is the lead case.
21 The case was filed by Mr. Thomas as administrator of the 22 estate of a deceased civilian government employee. He 23 was paid an award under the Federal Employees' 24 Compensation Act and brought suit against Lockheed on 25 product liability. That suit has been settled with the

1 agreement of the United States. There remains open only 2 the claim of the United States to immunity or absence of 3 liability because of the provisions of Section 8116(c)
4 of Title V.

5 That exclusive liability provision is printed
6 at page 2 of the blue brief. The Government insists 7 that its plain words provide that the Government should 8 be liable to no one in respect of an employee covered by 9 the Employees' Compensation Act.

10 We would be inclined to agree with the 11 Government if the statute stopped at the fifth line as 12 we have printed it. It would then read: "The liability 13 of the United States or an instrumentality under this 14 subchapter with respect to the injury or death of an 15 employee is exclusive and instead of all other liability
16 of the United States or the instrumentality."

17 If there came at that point a period, as I
18 have indicated, we think the Government would be right.
19 Instead, the statute goes on for another eight lines, 20 all of which would seem to be surplusage in the 21 Government reading.

22 Moreover, those eight lines themselves contain 23 a second, inexplicable redundancy under the Government's 24 reading. If suit is barred by all persons, why ever did 25 the Congress enumerate the employee, his legal

1 representative, spouse, dependents, next of kin?

2 QUESTION: Well, Mr. Gardner, isn't that a 3 fairly rational drafting of a sentence that starts with 4 the noun "liability" and then is talking about the 5 liability -- what liability, the liability to, and then 6 starting in the sixth line, to the employee, his legal 7 representative --

8 MR. GARDNER: Yes, sir, I think it's an 9 entirely rational statute. I think this has three times
10 been so read by this Court. It is barring the liability
11 of the employee and those who claim through the employee 12 because of the injury or death. The Government in its 13 reading would exclude the limiting clauses which I have 14 summarized as saying those who claim through the 15 employee. In the Government's reading all they need is 16 to bar liability with respect to the death to any 17 person, period.

18 If, as I insist, this is surplussage, it is 19 important to note that it did not arise because of hasty 20 drafting on the floor just prior to enactment of the 21 statute. It has deliberately been enacted by four 22 legislatures, all using virtually identical words: the 23 New York Legislature in 1922 when it passed its 24 Workmen's Compensation Act; the Federal Longshoremen and 25 Harbor Workers' Act of 1927 when they copied virtually

1 intact the words from the New York statute; the Congress 2 again in 1949 when this act was passed; and again in 3 1966 when Title V was codified.

4 I would think the government should have some 5 explanation for what by its reading must be a pervasive 6 and persistent addiction to surplussage over a period of 7 60 years by four legislatures.

8 QUESTION: Well, as you read the statute I
9 take it you don't find any of that surplussage.

10 MR. GARDNER: No, sir.

11 QUESTION: And would you say that the term
12 "any other person otherwise entitled to recover damages 13 from the United States" that appears in, I think, the 14 seventh and eighth lines, would you say that covered an 15 individual or corporation like Lockheed in this case?

16 MR. GARDNER: No, sir.

17 QUESTION: Why not?

18 MR. GARDNER: I would say that under the very 19 familiar principles of ejusdem generis that cover all 20 phrase is intended to refer to others of the same 21 class. For example, the draftsmen in looking to those 22 who might be claiming through the employee could not 23 know what varieties of persons under one state law or 24 another would have that right. For one of many examples
25 one can take the guardian ad litem for a minor

1 dependent. Obviously, to be safe you would want a 2 coverall clause.

3 This Court has three times approached this 4 language with consistent results, a consistency not 5 shown by the Government. In the Ryan case, Ryan against 6 Pan-Atlantic Steamship Company in the 350th United 7 States, the Court quoted these provisions in their 8 almost identical form as they appeared in the 9 Longshoremen and Harbor Workers' Act and said: "The 10 obvious purpose of this provision is to make the 11 employer's compensation liability exclusive to anyone 12 claiming under or through such employee" -- that 13 limiting phrase was repeated twice at page 129 of the 14 350th United States. That interpretation was adopted at 15 the urging of the Government.

16 Seven years later this Court considered 17 Weyerhaeuser Steamship Company against the United 18 States. This time the words were those in this statute,
19 the Federal Employees' Compensation Act. Mr. Justice
20 Stewart, writing for a unanimous Court, turned to these 21 words and said that the Government's contention as to 22 their plain meaning was not at all plain. This time the 23 Government was containing -- contending that plainly the 24 provision barred any third party claim over. He 25 referred to the principle of ejusdem generis in reaching

1 that conclusion. He went on to examine the legislative 2 history, and he found that that history was clear, that 3 the remedy of the Compensation Act was made exclusive
4 for the government employees and their representatives 5 or dependents, and that there was no evidence, I quote, 6 "no evidence whatever that Congress was concerned with 7 the rights of unrelated third parties."

8 Again this Court in Federal Marine Terminals
9 against Burnside Terminal -- Burnside Shipping Company
10 six years later in the 394th United States similarly -- 11 similarly read the provisions as stating that there was 12 no quid pro quo for third persons, and the statute was 13 not to be thought to extend to them. Quote, "On the 14 contrary, as emphasized in Ryan, the Act is concerned 15 only with the rights and obligations as between the 16 stevedore -- stevedoring contractor and the employee or 17 his representative."

18 If the Court will forgive me, I will need a 19 bit of water before I attack long words.

20 We see no occasion to retrace the legislative 21 history which was covered in Justice Stewart's opinion
22 in the Weyerhaeuser case. We have printed the committee 23 reports which are the sole explanation of these 24 exclusive liability provisions.

25 We do note, however, that in that statute,

1 statutory history, the Court said that the statute was 2 drawn from the Longshoremen Workers -- Longshoremen and 3 Harbor Workers' Act and from the New York statute in 4 1922.

5 In 1938, 11 years before this enactment, the 6 New York Court of Appeals had decided the Westchester
7 Lighting case. There an employee of the development 8 company was asphyxiated when another employee broke the 9 gas main of the lighting company. The employee received 10 an award, then obtained a judgment against the lighting 11 company which claimed over for tort indemnity against 12 the development company. The Court of Appeals allowed 13 the claim, stating that the lighting company sued for 14 its own injury and not for the injury to the deceased 15 employee.

16 By 1949 when this statute was enacted, the New 17 York rule had become firmly established. It had been 18 applied in a number of the lower New York cases once 19 again by the Court of Appeals of New York. The lower 20 Federal courts addressing the same words in the 21 Longshoremen's Act had by a large majority allowed the 22 claim, typically in reliance upon the Westchester 23 reasoning.

24 The Government has not seen fit to address the 25 impact of the New York rule upon this case. If it did,

1 so far as I could tell it would be forced to urge upon 2 this Court that neither the members of Congress nor the 3 Congressional committees or the staff or the committees 4 or the lawyers at the Federal Security Agency, which 5 drafted this statute by copying the provisions of the 6 New York statute, had any idea how the New York statute
7 had been interpreted. It seems to us most improbable.

8 I'd like to return for a moment to the merits
9 of the Weyerhaeuser case. There an Army dredge collided
10 with the Weyerhaeuser liner off the coast of Oregon. A 11 civilian government employee was aboard the dredge, and 12 after receiving award under the Compensation Act brought 13 suit against Weyerhaeuser and received a judgment.

14 The Admiralty Court found both vessels at 15 fault and divided damages. Weyerhaeuser presented in 16 its bill the payment made to the government employee.
17 This Court sustained Weyerhaeuser's position unanimously.

18 I find no way to distinguish in terms of 19 Section 8116(c) the admiralty claim for damages and the 20 tort indemnity claim for restitution. The Government's 21 principal distinction as I read their discussion is that 22 Weyerhaeuser dealt with an admiralty rule, that of 23 divided damages, of ancient vintage and well
24 established. Well, so, too, tort indemnity is a remedy 25 long established, found in decisions of this Court for

1 more than a century past.

2 QUESTION: Mr. Gardner, what in your case is 3 the analog to the Public Vessels Act in Weyerhaeuser -- 4 the Federal Tort Claims Act?

5 MR. GARDNER: Yes, sir.

6 QUESTION: Mr. Gardner, are you going to touch 7 on the independent duty and derivative?

8 MR. GARDNER: I plan, if Your Honor will give 9 me a minute or two to, in the vernacular, go to town on 10 that one. It is to my mind something that deserves a 11 great deal of comment, all of which should be adverse.

12 Nothing in Section 8116(c) draws any 13 distinction between admiralty and law, between divided
14 damages and tort indemnity, nor indeed any distinction
15 between the government employee who travels on an Army
16 dredge in contrast to the one who travels on an Air 17 Force plane.

18 I come now to the independent duty basis of 19 the decision below. The court's opinion seems to me to 20 have been a quite remarkable one. It dutifully quoted 21 the words of Section 8116(c) and never again referred to 22 them. It made no reference to the legislative history
23 of the provision. It paid no attention to the New York 24 rule. It made no meaningful citation of the 25 Weyerhaeuser case and none at all of the Ryan case.

1 Instead, it said that for Lockheed to recover it must 2 show an independent duty, independent, that is, of the 3 claim of the employee, and that Lockheed had not shown a 4 duty which was so independent.

5 In my view the term "independent duty" does 6 nothing but to generate what might be called a 7 metaphysical fog which obscures the true issue in the 8 case. The true issue must necessarily be what did the 9 legislature enact.

10 The term is, moreover, inevitably and 11 inherently question-begging. Every third party claim 12 will necessarily involve the death or the injury of the 13 employee. That necessary ingredient to the action is in 14 the but-for sense a cause of the action.

15 The observe side of this elusive coin is that 16 every third party claim also involve another 17 ingredient: the injury to the third party inflicted 18 when it is required to respond in judgment because of 19 the negligence of the Government or the employer.

20 I know of no way in which these interrelated 21 duties could be said to be either independent or to be 22 derivative. That's not entirely accurate. I know one 23 way, which is to look to the judgment and then go back
24 and describe the duty as independent or as derivative
25 according to the result.

1 The last thought which I would like to present
2 to the Court relates to the policies which the Congress
3 has uniformly followed in these exclusive liability
4 provisions. It has never curtailed a right or a remedy
5 without offering a compensating benefit called sometimes 6 in the committee reports a quid pro quo. Thus, the 7 employee, who is forbidden to bring suit against the 8 Government in search of a jury verdict, is given a fast, 9 fault-free, prompt award, which at least in the years
10 close to the enactment of the provision is a generous 11 one.

12 The Government, stripped of its customary
13 defenses, or the stevedoring employer in the other act
14 of contributory negligence, assumption of risk and so 15 on, gains a ceiling, a definite, assured limit to its 16 liability.

17 In 1972 the Congress amended the 18 Longshoremen's Act in two respects. First, it
19 eliminated the liability without fault of the vessel 20 based on the unseaworthiness doctrine to the 21 longshoremen. Having done that, and only because it did 22 that, it went on to eliminate the claim over by the 23 vessel against the stevedore on the ground that if the 24 vessel was now liable only for its own negligence, there 25 was no occasion to limit the claim over.

1 The Government here asks the Court to do to 2 the same words in this statute what the Congress was 3 required to do to the same words in the Longshoremen's 4 Act. It asks, moreover, that this Court act without the 5 sensitivity to the equities of the third person held 6 liable without fault which the Congress betrayed in the 7 1972 amendments.

8 We suggest that the Government's request that 9 you usurp the power to the Congress exercises more 10 harshly than the Congress would should be denied.

11 QUESTION: Mr. Gardner, may I ask, even if we 12 were to agree with you on your interpretation of the 13 Section 8116(c), what would we do about determining 14 whether there is a substantive right to indemnity under 15 the D.C. law? Would the Court have to remand?

16 MR. GARDNER: That has already been 17 determined, Your Honor. The District Court found first 18 that there was a substantive right to indemnity; second, 19 that there was no bar found in 8116(c).

20 QUESTION: But, of course, the Court of 21 Appeals didn't agree.

22 MR. GARDNER: The Court of Appeals did not 23 face that question. It was not appealed to it. The 24 Court of Appeals did not touch the substantive right of 25 indemnity. It was not presented to it by the

1 Government's appeal. It said that absent an independent
2 duty that indemnity was barred. If the bar of 8116(c)
3 were eliminated, the unappealed judgment of the District 4 Court on indemnity remains, it would not be necessary to 5 remand to have that one determined.

6 QUESTION: Mr. Gardner, if you lose this case,
7 do you still have a claim under the Suits and Admiralty 8 Act?

9 MR. GARDNER: It's not worth very much, Your 10 Honor. Under the Executive Jet decision --

11 QUESTION: So you -- you would not press it.

12 MR. GARDNER: We think it unlikely that we 13 have an admiralty claim, but no one could be absolutely 14 sure whether this vessel -- this aircraft starting out 15 from Saigon to the Philippines was discharging the 16 traditional duties of a surface vessel.

17 MR. GARDNER: I would like to reserve what few 18 minutes I have left, Your Honor.

19 CHIEF JUSTICE BURGER: Very well.

20 Ms. Corwin.

21 ORAL ARGUMENT OF CAROLYN F. CORWIN, ESQ.,

22 ON BEHALF OF THE RESPONDENT

23 MS. CORWIN: Mr. Chief Justice, and may it
24 please the Court:

25 The section that is at issue in this case is a

1 portion of a major workers' compensation program. It
2 was enacted by Congress in 1916, and it covers virtually 3 all Federal civilian employees.

4 Under the program, an employee who is injured
5 on the job receives compensation, and that compensation
6 occurs promptly, it occurs without regard to the fault
7 of either the employer or the employee, and it occurs
8 without litigation. It is an administrative scheme.

9 Thus, in the present case the Federal 10 employee, Ann Nash Bottorff, was aboard the C-5A when it 11 crashed and who died in that crash, had survivors.
12 Those survivors applied for death benefits under the 13 Federal Employees Compensation Act. It was concluded 14 that Ms. Bottorff was in the course of her duties at the 15 time of the crash, and the survivors received death 16 benefits.

17 Benefits are paid out of the Employees'
18 Compensation Fund within the Treasury Department.
19 Benefits paid out at the present time are running around 20 $1 billion per year. Payments to the employees under 21 the Federal Employees' Compensation program essentially 22 take the place of tort damages that an employee might 23 otherwise be entitled to recover.

24 QUESTION: Mr. Corwin, there were nine
25 employees injured and who died in the crash, weren't

1 there?

2 MS. CORWIN: That is correct. There were 3 civilians, there were civilian employees.

4 QUESTION: Has the Government conceded
5 liability as to those?

6 MS. CORWIN: The Government has entered into 7 agreements with Petitioner under which, as Petitioner's 8 counsel indicated, there will be payment of a portion of 9 the settlement liability.

10 The payment of the compensation to the Federal 11 employees who were a part of the group that died in the 12 C-5A crash, as I said, takes the place of tort damages, 13 and in essence what that creates is a ceiling for the 14 Federal agency. The agency can look to a ceiling that 15 allows it to avoid the uncertainty of potential tort 16 damages. In addition, the agency can avoid the constant 17 litigation that would arise if work-related injuries
18 were always settled in the courts under the tort system.

19 Now, this creates what has been referred to as 20 a limited liability feature: a limit on the liability 21 of the employer, in this case the federal agency. This 22 is something that Congress was particularly concerned 23 about in 1949. The legislative history does show that 24 Congress was quite concerned about complaints from 25 federal agencies. The agencies had found that they were

1 facing suits by -- facing suits concerning these 2 work-related accidents. They saw that they were being 3 opened to potential tort liability. They saw that they 4 were facing litigation. They would be forced to expend 5 time and resources on this litigation.

6 Congress did mention frequently in the 7 legislative history -- and we've cited some of the 8 portions in our brief on page 36 -- Congress expected
9 that by enacting Section 8116(c) there would be an end
10 to this sort of litigation; that agencies would be free 11 to proceed with their business, that they would not be 12 tied up in litigation, and that there would be savings 13 that could in turn be applied as compensation for the 14 employees.

15 Virtually all workers' compensation programs
16 include this sort of limited liability feature. And 17 this Court on several occasions has acknowledged in the 18 context of other compensation statutes that the limited 19 liability feature creates a protective mantle for the 20 employer, the federal agency in this case.

21 Under the Longshoremen's statute this Court
22 stated in Cooper Stevedoring that there was a protective 23 mantle created by limited liability and that that mantle
24 extended to third party claims against the employer
25 which had arisen out of the claim of the employee

1 against the third party based on the work-related injury.

2 QUESTION: Ms. Corwin, is there any weight of 3 authority among state decisions interpreting state 4 workmen's compensation laws as to whether the 5 governmental employer would be liable in a situation
6 like this or whether a private employer would be liable 7 in a situation like this?

8 MS. CORWIN: There is indeed authority to that 9 effect, and I believe we've cited in our brief some of 10 the summary discussion of that issue by Professor Larson.

11 QUESTION: Yeah. I asked you whether there 12 was authority to the effect that the Government would be 13 liable, and you said, I believe, that yes, there was a 14 lot of authority that the Government would be liable.
15 Is that what you meant to say?

16 MS. CORWIN: No. I must have misunderstood
17 your question. I did not mean to say that. The 18 indication under the state laws governing private 19 employers is that the employer is immune from this sort 20 of third party suit; that in addition to the liability, 21 limited liability vis-a-vis the employee or any 22 dependents or whatever, in addition, any sort of third
23 part suit of the sort that Petitioner is urging here 24 also is barred.

25 Now, Petitioner's counsel raised the New York

1 law and suggested that we had not addressed the New York
2 law. I believe we've indicated at least at one point in 3 our brief that there is some question as to what the New 4 York law in fact was at the time of passage in 1949 of 5 this section.

6 I think it's important to note that both the 7 House and Senate reports on this legislation do not 8 refer to the New York law; rather, the language that 9 Congress used was state workmen's compensation laws in 10 general have this sort of provision, referring to the 11 exclusive liability provision. There is some mention of 12 New York laws -- Petitioner has referred to it in its 13 brief -- but that mention is in the hearings, and it is 14 in the context of mentioning that this legislation is 15 based on the Longshoremen's statute, the New York
16 statute and other workers' compensation statutes.

17 QUESTION: These were the 1949 hearings, not 18 the original enactment of the LHWCA.

19 MS. CORWIN: That's correct. This is in 1949
20 when Congress was looking at this problem that the 21 Federal agencies had brought up to it, and there was 22 realization that in fact there were models for this sort 23 of provision around, that states had it, that the 24 Longshoremen's statute had it, and in fact that this was 25 something that might fit the bill for the Federal

1 agencies.

2 Now, I suggest that New York was one among 3 many and that if there was any model, perhaps it was the 4 Longshoremen's statute, which as this Court has observed 5 is very close to the language here.

6 The New York situation in 1949 was simply not 7 that clear. Petitioner's counsel has referred to the 8 Westchester Lighting case in 1938. That case has been 9 interpreted by the Second Circuit on several occasions 10 as referring to a contractual sort of claim, not a tort 11 claim of the type that Petitioner is urging, but rather 12 -- and this is where the independent duty language comes 13 in -- the Court used the term "independent duty" in the 14 New York case, but the Second Circuit has interpreted 15 that as a duty arising out of a contractual relationship 16 between the lighting company and the landowner in that 17 case. So it is not at all clear that anyone was 18 contemplating New York law vis-a-vis tort indemnity of 19 the sort the Petitioner is urging here.

20 The Longshoremen's statute is not the only 21 area that this Court has looked at with respect to the 22 limited liability feature of a compensation scheme. The 23 Court examined the military compensation scheme in 24 Stencel Aero in 1977. This was a claim that was very 25 similar to the one that's put forward here. It involved

1 a contractor. It involved product liability.

2 The Court examined several features of that 3 case, and one of them was the limited liability feature
4 of the military compensation statute. The Court again
5 referred, as it had in the Longshoremen's case, to the 6 protective mantle that is granted to an employer under a 7 compensation statute, and it said that it's an essential 8 feature of a compensation scheme such as the military 9 compensation scheme that was before it, and I suggest 10 such as the compensation scheme that applies to Federal 11 civilian employees.

12 The Court indicated that it would be a 13 circumvention of that limited liability feature for the 14 Court to permit the third party claim that was urged so 15 strenuously in that case. That sort of reasoning
16 applies to this statute as well -- again, the limited 17 liability feature in a workers' compensation scheme.

18 In essence --

19 QUESTION: How do you overcome the 20 Weyerhaeuser case, however?

21 MS. CORWIN: I think that this Court in the 22 Weyerhaeuser case was looking at a rather different 23 situation than what we have in this case. The claim in 24 Weyerhaeuser was not a tort, a purely tort claim. It 25 was not even under the Tort Claims Act. It's not the 1 sort we have here. Instead, it was an admiralty claim.

2 The Court perceived -- the Court described it in terms
3 of an ancient rule that seemed to have governed rights 4 and duties in the area of collisions in the maritime 5 area.

6 The Court also looked at the fact that it had 7 decided the case long ago, long before the Federal 8 Employees Compensation Act was even enacted initially in 9 1916. The Court in the preceding century had decided 10 the Chatahoochee, another admiralty case involving the 11 divided damages rule. And I think the Court was seeking 12 to reconcile what it had before it in Weyerhaeuser with 13 what it had decided in the past and -- and had been on 14 the books at the time the Compensation passed -- Act was 15 passed.

16 Essentially, I think what the Court saw in 17 Weyerhaeuser was something it viewed as analogous to the 18 contractual indemnity provision that -- or contractual 19 -- implied contractual indemnity in Ryan. The Court in 20 Weyerhaeuser did turn to Ryan and said we don't find a 21 contract here, but we find something that's very similar 22 to the contract, and therefore, we think that Congress
23 probably did not intend. We think this is more like 24 Ryan which we've already said is not barred by the 25 Longshoremen's equivalent provision.

1 And I think the Court there simply was --

2 QUESTION: But the language used certainly is 3 broad enough to have some implications here, wouldn't 4 you agree?

5 MS. CORWIN: I think that the Court did make 6 some statements about the language in Weyerhaeuser that 7 do appear to be broad, but I think the language that 8 you're referring to is not necessary to the Court's 9 decision in that case, and I think in fact what the 10 Court concluded was that the language simply was not 11 enough to allow it to answer that question that was 12 before it in Weyerhaeuser.

13 The conclusion of the Court was that the 14 language simply wasn't -- it wasn't plain, and it had 15 looked through the legislative history, and it didn't 16 find a mention of third parties; and, therefore, it felt 17 it ought to move on and consider these other features 18 I've referred to -- the ancient admiralty rule, the 19 analogy to Ryan.

20 I think that the Court was simply not faced
21 with the sort of tort indemnity claim that we have here 22 in which the liability alleged is basically a -- the 23 liability of a joint tort feaser. It is not based on 24 some sort of contract. It is not based on some ancient 25 admiralty rule. Rather, it is purely a tort claim.

1 QUESTION: But wasn't the claim in 2 Weyerhaeuser, didn't it arise out of the -- out of -- 3 out of the injury or death of a crewman?

4 MS. CORWIN: Indeed, the element of damages at 5 issue in Weyerhaeuser was in fact the amount that had 6 been paid to an employee who had previously received 7 compensation.

8 QUESTION: And that's what -- that's what the 9 Court said could be claimed over.

10 MS. CORWIN: Well, the Court was not
11 necessarily talking about a claim over in that case. It 12 was referring to a rule under the admiralty system in 13 which the damages, all sorts of damages, were really put 14 into one pot and then split in half. This was a way
15 that apparently admiralty had had for a number of years
16 of divying things up when two ships ran into each other,
17 in essence. So it was not really what you'd call a 18 contribution claim or an indemnity claim. It was this 19 question of what you ought to do with all the damages, 20 and the decision was yes, you could include this.

21 QUESTION: But how did -- how did the case get 22 started in Weyerhaeuser?

23 MS. CORWIN: Well, the case started
24 essentially when the two ships ran into each other.

25 QUESTION: Well, I know, but the lawsuit, what

1 lawsuits, what lawsuit was brought?

2 MS. CORWIN: I think there was a -- my 3 knowledge of admiralty is limited, but I believe that 4 there was a -- probably a limited -- limitation on 5 liability proceeding, and there was -- the question at 6 issue before the court was --

7 QUESTION: Well, did the injured person get a
8 judgment against the third party other than the employer?

9 MS. CORWIN: I believe there was a 10 settlement. I believe there had been a suit by the 11 employee that was settled.

12 QUESTION: I guess the third party.

13 MS. CORWIN: I beg your pardon?

14 QUESTION: I guess the third party, third
15 party --

16 MS. CORWIN: That's correct.

17 QUESTION: -- In the sense somebody other than 18 the employer.

19 MS. CORWIN: That's correct. The employee had 20 sued the third party and had recovered a settlement, not 21 a judgment but a settlement. And the question was 22 whether that $16,000 settlement ought to go into the pot.

23 QUESTION: And did the third party bring in 24 the Government in that suit or what?

25 MS. CORWIN: I believe that the third party

1 then in the separate proceeding involving how you ought 2 to apportion the damages, including the property damages
3 from the collision, then said we ought to put in this 4 other element of damages as well.

5 QUESTION: Well, so there was a claim over:
6 please pay part of the damages that we've had to pay.

7 MS. CORWIN: Well, I think that --

8 QUESTION: That's what it was.

9 MS. CORWIN: -- One could argue that it is the 10 same sort of thing, but I think this Court saw it in a 11 somewhat different context, in the context of a 12 proceeding that was really part of the rules and rights 13 and liabilities of the individuals who were out there 14 sailing around the ocean.

15 QUESTION: Yes, but the -- those rules
16 survived the enactment of this statute. This statute 17 didn't cut off the liability at the ceiling of the 18 compensation program. And I'm wondering if the 19 Government has at any time since that decision asked
20 Congress to straighten it out, because I think you
21 acknowledge in your brief that you think that decision 22 was wrong.

23 MS. CORWIN: I am not aware of any effort to 24 try to overturn that sort of court-created admiralty
25 rule. I'm not aware of any legislative effort.

1 QUESTION: Well, in a sense it was an 2 admiralty rule, but it was also construction of this 3 very provision we have before us. They quote the same
4 -- Justice Stewart quotes the same language in --

5 MS. CORWIN: It quotes the same language, but 6 as I suggested, I think the conclusion was the language 7 simply wasn't enough to answer the question before the 8 Court concerning what you do with this divided damages 9 rule.

10 QUESTION: What do you do with your opponent's 11 argument that if the statute meant what you say it
12 means, why don't you just stop after the word
13 "instrumentality?" Why isn't the rest of the statute 14 redundant?

15 MS. CORWIN: Well, I think there are several 16 answers to that question. First, I think it's strange 17 to suggest that the first part of the statute in fact 18 gives the Government exclusive liability, but then 19 somehow the expansion and the explanation that follow 20 take it away again. I'm not sure that that makes very 21 much sense in terms of statutory construction.

22 QUESTION: Well, it doesn't take it away. It 23 just describes the area with which -- in which the 24 viability shall be exclusive as he reads it.

25 MS. CORWIN: Well, Petitioner's counsel

1 suggests that the first part in fact would grant 2 exclusive liability, but the fact that it's been 3 expanded upon in the latter part of the section somehow
4 takes it away. I'm not sure that that's a proper 5 reading.

6 I think that that language, much of it was 7 added in 1949, and there was no explanation of why there 8 was an enumeration, but the language was very similar to 9 what one finds in the Longshoremen statute and a number 10 of state statutes. Not only New York. I believe places
11 like Georgia and Minnesota and others had this same sort 12 of enumeration.

13 QUESTION: But to the extent that it's the 14 same as the Longshoremen's Act doesn't the Ryan case cut 15 against you?

16 MS. CORWIN: No, I think not. Ryan very 17 specifically turned on the implied contractual indemnity 18 that the Court found in that case and that the 19 Government urged on the Court to find; that really the 20 focus was is there something other than tort liability 21 here; can we look to the relationship between the 22 parties in Ryan and find a service relationship, a 23 contract to perform a duty and to perform it well, and 24 can we read into that some sort of obligation to 25 indemnify.

1 The Court concluded in that case that yes, it
2 could, and it specifically stated that it did not 3 address the problem that Petitioner presents; that of 4 this noncontractual indemnity, the purely tort-based 5 indemnity.

6 I think that this Court and the lower courts
7 looking to this Court's decisions have been rather 8 careful to distinguish that sort of contract, whether it 9 be express or implied, from the kind of pure joint tort 10 feaser situation that we have here.

11 Now, I don't know exactly why Congress chose 12 the particular enumerations it did. It may well have 13 been that the thought was to give some notice to 14 individuals that would be affected by this act to be 15 sure everybody understood just who was excluded. But I
16 think that the addition of the rather very broad phrase
17 "all other persons" or "anyone," as it was at that time,
18 "anyone otherwise entitled to recover damages," I think 19 that is a broad phrase that one simply ought not to 20 confine to some very small category. I'm not sure there 21 is anything else to put into that category other than 22 third parties.

23 QUESTION: But even your emphasis on that 24 language just -- it might have been written "any 25 liability to any person otherwise entitled to recover

1 damages from the United States," but it doesn't -- there 2 are a lot of ways you could have written your 3 interpretation more briefly, I think.

4 MS. CORWIN: Well, I agree there are many 5 different ways. I think the general tone of the statute 6 is a very broad one.

7 QUESTION: Yeah.

8 MS. CORWIN: I think when you look at the 9 legislative history you don't find any expectation on 10 the part of Congress that this limited liability feature 11 is going to be somehow breached in particular cases.
12 You don't have Congress giving any indication that its 13 expectations about the savings of money to government, 14 and particularly the savings in litigation having to be 15 in court all the time over these thousands of 16 work-related accidents, you don't find any indication
17 that Congress thought sometimes this will be the case 18 and sometimes not. Rather, the statements were we 19 believe this is going to keep the agencies out of the 20 courts.

21 So I think you have to read the statutory 22 language in light of that expectation. You have to read
23 it in light of the expectation that under a compensation 24 scheme the limited liability feature is going to be an 25 effective one; that it ought not be circumvented, as the

1 Court has suggested, by the third party claim. If it
2 were, you would have the anomaly under which the mere 3 fortuity of the involvement of a third party in an 4 accident would break down the limited liability feature; 5 that is, if you had the Government as the only party and 6 individual tort feaser that was one hundred percent 7 negligent, under Congress' statute the Government -- the 8 Government's liability is confined to its compensation
9 payment. However, if somehow you have a third party
10 that comes into the picture, then suddenly that breaks 11 down. If the Government is 75 percent negligent and 12 someone else is 25 percent negligent, then you have no
13 more limited liability.

14 QUESTION: Well, I don't understand the 15 Petitioner's claim here to extend to a case where there 16 is is simply joint tort feasers, both the Government and 17 somebody else both harm the employee. Isn't the 18 Petitioner's claim predicated at least in part on some 19 differing degree of responsibility?

20 MS. CORWIN: I'm not sure there's any way to 21 limit Petitioner's claim in that manner. The sort of 22 allegation in the question presented is framed in terms
23 of active negligence and secondary liability. I think 24 it was Justice Black who pointed out in his dissent in 25 Ryan that those are very slippery terms. You really

1 can't quite tell what they mean.

2 QUESTION: Well, your impression then is that 3 the Petitioner's claim would claim the same sort of 4 right even if it were just simply two joint feasers, 5 neither of whom would be entitled to contribution from 6 the other at common law, by the law of the state?

7 MS. CORWIN: I think that's correct. I don't 8 see any way to really cut off this principle at some 50
9 percent level. And as I say, I'm not sure what active 10 negligence means, but if it means more than 50 percent 11 I'm not sure why this principle that breaks down the 12 limited liability can apply on a 51 percent liability 13 but not on 49 percent liability.

14 I don't see anything in the way that 15 Petitioner has framed its argument in this case that 16 really limits to something like an indemnity claim as 17 opposed to a contribution claim. I think the courts 18 have recognized that this sort of indemnity claim, not 19 based on a contract but based on differing degrees of 20 negligence, is really an extreme form of contribution.
21 There is really not that much to differentiate it from 22 any joint feaser claim.

23 QUESTION: Did -- did -- wasn't there a claim 24 in the Court of Appeals and isn't there still here that 25 the Government owes Lockheed because of some independent

1 duty that -- that the Government owes Lockheed?

2 MS. CORWIN: We certainly read Lockheed's
3 brief to suggest that they thought that was the case,
4 and we pointed that out in our reply and got a firm
5 denial. I'm not sure where we stand on independent duty.

6 QUESTION: What did -- the claim was made in 7 the Court of Appeals, though, I take it.

8 MS. CORWIN: Certainly the claim based on 9 independent duty was made in the Court of Appeals based 10 on some law that had arisen in the D.C. circuit.

11 QUESTION: And was rejected by the Court of 12 Appeals.

13 MS. CORWIN: It was not -- the concept was not 14 rejected, but the Court of Appeals --

15 QUESTION: Said there wasn't an independent 16 duty.

17 MS. CORWIN: The Court of Appeals looked at 18 the claims that were being made and said these just 19 clearly aren't independent duties.

20 QUESTION: These are indemnity -- this is an 21 indemnity.

22 MS. CORWIN: These are things that are -- and 23 it specifically referred to the statutory language, 24 although it picked the earlier version rather than the 25 later version -- it said these duties are on account of

1 or, alternatively, because of injuries or death. There 2 are simply not the sorts of independent duties that 3 other courts have been talking about, and those are 4 things like the Ryan implied contractual indemnity and 5 perhaps this divided damages rule.

6 QUESTION: So do you think -- do you think we 7 need deal at all with the independent duty? Do you 8 think there's any claim here that the Government's 9 liability rests on that?

10 MS. CORWIN: I think that -- I think not. I
11 think Petitioner has suggested that it is not 12 particularly interested in pressing that point, and I 13 think that any independent duty as formulated by any 14 other court is more a matter of contract and not this 15 sort of pure indemnity claim.

16 I believe Justice O'Connor asked Petitioner's
17 counsel about this independent duty.

18 QUESTION: Yes.

19 MS. CORWIN: And I didn't hear any response 20 that suggested that in fact they had prevailed on that 21 or that they were pressing that here. So I don't think 22 it's something that the Court needs to address.

23 QUESTION: Am I correct in assuming that the 24 original plaintiff has no interest whatsoever in the 25 outcome of this dispute; that the recovery, the

1 settlement recovery is precisely the same whether it's 2 paid entirely by Lockheed or shared with the Government?

3 MS. CORWIN: That is correct. I think the 4 amount has been determined and possibly paid out. I'm 5 not sure of that. The question here is simply should 6 the Government be asked to take on part of that tort 7 settlement.

8 Now, Petitioner has referred to itself in the 9 brief as a stranger to the compensation system; and we 10 suggest that that's not really the case. The 11 compensation systems have been around for a long time, 12 and I think that Petitioner is well aware of them in the 13 state context; in fact, probably takes advantage of this 14 limited liability in the states where it is an 15 employer. Petitioner is an experienced government 16 contractor and is used to dealing with the government; 17 in fact, could have anticipated that in this case the 18 likeliest thing that could have happened would be the 19 C-5A going down with a full complement of troops,
20 military personnel; and under Stencel Aero this Court 21 has said that there would be simply no chance of a third 22 party claim in that case.

23 So I think that Petitioner is complaining
24 largely about the fact that the tort system allows a 25 plaintiff to recover against single tort feaser and

1 sometimes another is not available to help share. And 2 this is the sort of thing that can be foreseen and 3 planned against, particularly by someone in Petitioner's 4 situation.

5 In sum, we urge that this Court protect the 6 limited liability feature that we think Congress fully 7 intended in 1949 to make clear to codify and incorporate 8 into the act. Petitioner's interpretation, we urge, is 9 one that would break down that limited liability feature 10 and would be contrary to the sort of scheme that 11 Congress set up. We urge the Court to reject that 12 interpretation and to maintain what we believe to be the 13 intent of Congress ever since 1949.

14 Thank you.

15 CHIEF JUSTICE BURGER: Do you have anything
16 further, Mr. Gardner?

17 ORAL ARGUMENT OF WARNER W. GARDNER, ESQ.,
18 ON BEHALF OF THE PETITIONER -- REBUTTAL

19 MR. GARDNER: If I can indulge the Court's 20 patience for about one and a half to two minutes, I have 21 a comment or two I would like to make.

22 CHIEF JUSTICE BURGER: You have four minutes
23 remaining.

24 MR. GARDNER: Maybe I can hand back a half a 25 minute of a minute, sir.

1 The Government continues to state that the 2 concern of Congress for the expense and the cost of 3 litigation indicates that they're right here. This 4 Court said in Stewart, as we've, I think, demonstrated
5 in our quotation as to the legislative history, Congress 6 was concerned, but it was concerned with the cost and 7 the expense of litigation brought by the Government
8 employee. It never thought of the third person.

9 The weight of authority in the state courts is 10 a more complex inquiry than the Government has 11 indicated. Professor Larson, their favorite employee or 12 commentator, does not distinguish according to the terms 13 of the statute. Of the 38 cases cited by him, 19 relate 14 to states in which there is a broad and comprehensive 15 elimination of liability. The remaining 19 are divided 16 roughly 6 to 6 if one excludes the 7 state cases which 17 were concerned with state tort indemnity or contribution 18 law, not with the bar of the statute.

19 We're left, I think, without any form of 20 guidance if we look to the majority view of the states.
21 But I don't believe we should. I think the New York
22 statute, explicitly adopted by the Congress and firmly
23 interpreted by 1949 -- the criticisms of the New York 24 rule are those of the Second Circuit after 1949. At the 25 time this statute was adopted there was not question.

1 The tort feaser point, whether or not we are 2 claiming something like contribution, I think can be put 3 aside. As Justice Stevens explained in the Northwest
4 Airlines case, tort indemnity is like the ancient 5 chancery remedy coming into play when there is an 6 inadequacy of the legal remedy. And it could well be in 7 that one state or another there would be difficulties 8 with a joint tort feaser contribution. But the 9 principle of restitution which underlies tort indemnity 10 now, as in the 13th and 14th centuries, is expected to 11 fill the need. That was discussed very thoroughly in 12 the New York and the Illinois cases which we've cited in 13 our brief.

14 One last thought on the Stencel case. The 15 Government naturally seizes upon one of the three 16 factors which the Court in the aggregate found 17 sufficient to bar recovery over by the contractor.
18 Those three factors were the preeminence of the Federal 19 interest and the undesirability of subjecting it to 20 state law in the conduct of military operations. The 21 second factor was the compensation system which was in 22 effect for the serviceman. The third factor, the 23 overwhelming factor, in my view, is the fact you can 24 neither discipline troops nor conduct wars in terms of 25 tort litigation.

1 I would suggest that the Brown case, decided 2 after Feres, and the Brooks case cited before it dealing 3 with ex-servicemen and dealing with off-duty servicemen
4 and finding Feres inapplicable even though there was a 5 compensation system suggests that the military 6 discipline factor is the preeminent one.

7 Thank you.

8 CHIEF JUSTICE BURGER: Thank you, counsel.

9 The case is submitted.

10 (Whereupon, at 3:02 p.m., the case in the 11 above-entitled matter was submitted.)
