2 CHIEF JUSTICE BURGER: Mr. Schwartz, I think
3 you may proceed whenever you're ready.

4 ORAL ARGUMENT OF JOSHUA I. SCWHARTZ, ESQ., 5 ON BEHALF OF THE PETITIONER

6 MR. SCHWARTZ: Thank you, Mr. Chief Justice,
7 and may it please the Court:

8 This case is here for a second time on writ of 9 certiorari to review a decision of the former United 10 States Court of Claim holding that the United States is 11 answerable in money damages for alleged statutory 12 violations pertaining to management by the Secretary of 13 the Interior of timber on allotted lands of the Quinault 14 Indian Reservation in the State of Washington.

15 Throughout this litigation several categories 16 of damages have been sought by the respondents against 17 the United States. These include an alleged shortfall 18 in revenues earned on the account of the respondents 19 owing to the Secretary's failure to obtain maximum 20 market value from purchasers of the Indian timber for 21 timber sold; the Secretary's alleged failure to manage 22 the timber on a sustained yield basis; and the 23 Secretary's alleged failure to sell some of the 24 merchantable timber located on the Indian allotments.

25 In addition, damages are sought for the

1 Secretary's failure to develop an optimum system of 2 roads in the logged areas and for roadbuilding charges 3 deducted from the revenues earned on timber sales. And 4 finally, respondents complain that insufficient interest 5 was paid or in some cases that no interest was paid on 6 funds held by the Secretary on the account of the Indian 7 respondents.

8 When this case first came before the Court of 9 Claims, that court held that Section 5 of the General 10 Allotment Act, pursuant to which the forested lands of 11 the Quinault Indian Reservation had been allotted, 12 established a general trust which included management 13 duties, and that by necessary implication the remedy of 14 damages was available to the respondents to redress any 15 mismanagement of the timber resources.

16 This Court in the case that we call Mitchell 1 17 reversed that decision of the Court of Claims. The 18 Court did not reach the question whether the creation of 19 an express trust by statute would itself ground an 20 action for damages against the United States, because 21 the Court concluded that the trust that had in fact been 22 created by the General Allotment Act was not a general 23 trust and did not encompass duties of management.

24 This Court remanded the case to the Court of 25 Claims to provide that court with an opportunity to 1 reach other theories of recovery advanced by the 2 respondents.

3 In Mitchell 2, the en banc Court of Claims,
4 with Judge Nichols dissenting this time, again held that 5 the United States was answerable in damages in respect 6 of each of the respondents' major claims of injury. The 7 threshold, the court refused to confine the implication
8 of a damage remedy against the United States to statutes 9 which provide for the payment of money or which 10 expressly provide for a damage remedy.

11 The court then turned to the particular 12 statutes which are involved here. These are: 25 U.S.C.
13 406, 407 and 466, which pertain to the sale of timber on 14 Indian lands; another group of statutes in 25 U.S.C.
15 318(a) and 323 through 325, which govern roadbuilding on 16 Indian reservations and the granting of rights-of-way
17 over Indian lands.

18 Although the court recognized that none of 19 these statutes expressly created a trust duty of any 20 kind, the court held that "A long continuing doctrine of 21 governmental fiduciary obligation in the management of 22 Indian property was," quote, "infused into these 23 statutes." And the court thought that because the 24 purpose of the statutes generally from the point of view
25 of the Indians was to generate revenue, it was necessary

1 that the court imply a damages remedy to enforce the 2 statutory requirements.

3 Accordingly, the court held that recovery in 4 damages of amounts that should have been earned but were 5 not earned on the account of the Indian beneficiaries 6 could be recovered against the United States, and that 7 similar damages could be recovered under the 8 roadbuilding statutes. Finally, the court held that 9 damages could be recovered against the United States for 10 failure to pay interest on respondents' funds held by 11 the United States at a rate reflecting reasonable 12 management zeal to get the best interest rate for 13 respondents.

14 Because of the substantial importance of the 15 -- of the doctrinal holding of the Court of Claims and 16 because of the substantial amount of money which is at 17 stake in this case, we have again sought this Court's 18 review.

19 It is our central submission that the Court of 20 Claims' analysis is inconsistent with the teaching of 21 this Court respecting recovery of damages against the 22 United States in that the decision below effectively
23 dispenses with the requirement that Congress authorized 24 the recovery of damages.

25 The parties appear to be in agreement on one

1 fundamental point, and that is the standard for 2 determining whether a statute provides for the recovery
3 of damages against the United States is that supplied by 4 this Court's decision in United States v. Testan; that 5 is, whether the statute -- and I'd like to quote -- "in 6 itself can fairly be interpreted as mandating 7 compensation for the damage sustained."

8 At that point agreement ends in this case, and 9 the question is what it means to fairly -- for a statute 10 to be fairly interpretable as mandating compensation.

11 In our own analysis we start with the language
12 of the pertinent statutes. None of the statutes involved 13 in this case makes any mention of maintenance of 14 litigation or recovery of damages against the United 15 States.

16 Furthermore, although the statutes do in some 17 instances refer to the payment of money, the Court of 18 Claims did not suggest, nor does respondent now suggest, 19 that their claims arise under that statutory language.

20 QUESTION: I guess you would concede, wouldn't 21 you, though, that, for instance, the timber statutes 22 would mandate that the Government pay the allottees the 23 money to the extent that it's earned on the timber?

24 MR. SCHWARTZ: Yes, Justice O'Connor. And, in 25 fact, we make the further point that because the statute

1 makes that clear, it is to be assumed that Congress did 2 not intend to sanction the recovery of some other 3 amounts of money against the United States.

4 I would add one point of qualification. The 5 statute in fact prescribes that the money be paid to the 6 Indians or used for their benefit, so that if the 7 Secretary -- the Secretary has the authority to do other 8 things with the money. But were he not to do that, he 9 would not -- the Indians would be able to maintain suit, 10 we suppose, to compel the funds that are in hand to be 11 disgorged.

12 It's our view that the statutory language here 13 might be profitably compared with statutes which have 14 been regarded as authorizing the recovery of damages 15 against the United States. A common example that comes 16 to mind is the Federal Tort Claims Act which specifies 17 that the United States shall be liable respecting 18 provisions of this title relating to tort claims in the 19 same manner and to the same extent as a private 20 individual under like circumstances.

21 Another comparison might be drawn to the 22 language of the Indian Claims Commission Act which 23 provides that the Claims Commission shall herein 24 determine all claims in law and equity with respect to 25 which the claimant would have been entitled to sue in a

1 court of the United States if the United States were 2 sueable; and moreover, all claims based on fair and 3 honorable dealings that are not recognized by an 4 existing rule of law or equity.

5 QUESTION: Mr. Schwartz, can I interrupt a
6 second, because Justice O'Connor's question troubles me 7 also.

8 There's no such language in the statute that 9 says when you sell the timber and collect some money, 10 you pay it over to the Indians, is there?

11 MR. SCHWARTZ: Oh, no, there is such language,
12 and I gathered that was the basis of Justice O'Connor's 13 question, with the one qualification that I've given.
14 The statute, if I may direct your attention to page 15 1A of the Appendix.

16 QUESTION: I don't seem to have it. Go ahead.

17 MR. SCHWARTZ: If I may read: "The timber on 18 any Indian land held on a trust -- held under a trust or 19 other patent containing restrictions on alienations may 20 be sold by the owner with the consent of the Secretary" 21 -- I'll skip over a few words, if I may -- "and the 22 proceeds from such sales, after deductions for 23 administrative expenses, shall be paid to the owner or 24 owners."

25 It is that kind of provision which we have in

1 mind as likely grounding an action to recover monies
2 against the United States. And the existence of that 3 language, we submit, suggests that some other larger 4 group of monies that are not in hand and are not 5 proceeds cannot be recovered against the United States.

6 QUESTION: But the language of "shall be paid 7 to the owner" is sufficient in your view to constitute a 8 waiver of sovereign immunity under Testan, is that right?

9 MR. SCHWARTZ: Justice O'Connor, we think it
10 probably would be held to be. Testan, there is some 11 inevitable grayness and fuzziness as to what is a 12 mandate for compensation. It is our view that statutes 13 that unequivocally direct payment of money generally, 14 presumptively or ordinarily would be understood as 15 sufficiently clear. On the other hand, such statutes do 16 not invariably ground compensation.

17 This Court's decision last term in United 18 States v. Erica comes to mind. Although the Court there 19 didn't reach a sovereign immunity issue and specified 20 that, because it found an express bar to recovery of 21 damages, we would suppose that the Court could have 22 couched its holding in terms that the Government did not 23 consent the recovery of damages. Where -- where a 24 statute provides for payment of money without any 25 qualification, then the presumption may go one way.

1 When there is no such provision, for reasons I'd like to 2 turn to, we think the presumption should be very 3 strongly the other way.

4 There's a fundamental difference that we 5 believe should not escape notice between statutes that 6 direct payment of money and statutes that impose
7 nonmonetary duties upon officers of the United States.

8 QUESTION: Can I go back to the timber statute 9 again? I do have it in front of me now. It does have 10 the mandatory language that you called our attention to, 11 the proceeds shall be paid over. Then later in the same 12 paragraph there is this mandatory language about what 13 the Secretary shall do with regard to administrative 14 expenses and how he should sell it.

15 You're saying that the second half of it 16 doesn't contemplate any -- any payment if he breaches 17 those duties, is that it?

18 MR. SCHWARTZ: I'm not sure what -- what your 19 reference is to in the second --

20 QUESTION: Well, sales of timber under this 21 subsection shall be based upon a consideration of the 22 needs and best interests of the owner, Indian owners and 23 his heirs. And say the Secretary says well, I'll just 24 ignore that and sell it for half of what I think I could 25 get for it.

1 MR. SCHWARTZ: In that event it is our 2 submission -- I'd like to turn to the difference between 3 that kind of statutory provision and the one that goes 4 before.

5 The short answer is that we believe that the 6 second kind of duties are nonmonetary duties and that 7 Congress should be understood to have intended a 8 nonmonetary specific injunctive or declaratory remedy.

9 QUESTION: Even though they come in a 10 statutory provision that you acknowledge is -- does -- 11 can fairly be interpreted as mandating compensation.

12 MR. SCHWARTZ: For certain items.

13 QUESTION: I see.

14 MR. SCHWARTZ: We think that it is in the 15 nature of the sovereign immunity analysis that very 16 particular attention should be paid to what items
17 Congress contemplated to be paid without further 18 authority and what items not.

19 QUESTION: I understood your brief to take the 20 position you really weren't arguing sovereign immunity.
21 You're basically arguing implied cause of action theory.

22 MR. SCHWARTZ: Perhaps I should spend a minute
23 on that. I think this is a bit of semantic confusion.
24 I don't really want to take much time unless it concerns
25 the Court.

1 It is our understanding that the Court has 2 used somewhat inconsistent language from time to time in 3 describing the Tucker Act. We believe that the cases
4 such as United States v. Sherwood and last term's 5 decision in Army and Air Force Exchange v. Sheehan refer 6 to the Tucker Act as a waiver of sovereign immunity, and 7 cases such as Mitchell 1 and Testan say that it is not,
8 that it is merely jurisdictional; that some other 9 statute must provide the waiver.

10 It seems to us that it doesn't matter how you
11 put the point. Clearly, the Tucker Act is sufficient 12 unto itself as a basis for recovering damages on a 13 contract claim. That's -- the Tucker Act didn't do 14 that. The Tucker Act didn't do anything at all.

15 On the other hand, we suppose -- the Congress 16 and the legislative history is consistent -- that 17 Congress did not consent to recovery of damages on any 18 claim that might be tied to some statute which imposes a 19 nonmonetary duty. And the way that has been 20 rationalized and expressed by the Court in Testan and 21 Mitchell is that what -- Congress provided jurisdiction
22 to entertain claims where the act of Congress was of a 23 particular character.

24 Now, one can say that as to the statutory 25 claims, the Tucker Act is a waiver of sovereign immunity

1 and that the other statute must provide the right of 2 action, or one can say that the Tucker Act is merely a 3 conditional waiver as to the statutory claims, or one 4 can say, as Testan appears to have literally said, that 5 it's not a waiver at all.

6 But the point to us seems to be exactly the 7 same any way you read it: either the rule is that a 8 waiver -- waivers of sovereign immunity are to be 9 strictly construed according to their terms, or else the 10 rule is that an unequivocal sovereign immunity is 11 required.

12 In either event, the other statute in addition 13 to the Tucker Act must make clear that Congress 14 contemplated the award of damages. And this is sort of 15 a semantic embroglio we may have created by ourselves.
16 But we don't think the legal result --

17 QUESTION: You didn't create it. We did.

18 MR. SCHWARTZ: Gracious of you to say so,
19 Justice Rehnquist.

20 We do think -- I'd like to explain why the 21 provisions of statutes such as Section 406 that create 22 nonmonetary obligations for federal officers have a 23 different standing in the sovereign immunity analysis, 24 if I may use that shorthand, than statutes that 25 contemplate the payment of money.

1 Statutes that prescribe the payment of money
2 create an obligation for the United States. Statues
3 that direct federal officers to take certain action 4 prescribe duties for officers. And as to those 5 statutes, absent some comment by Congress, some 6 indication that Congress appreciated that federal 7 officers might not perform their duties, and that the 8 United States Treasury might thereby be impacted for -- 9 by an action for damages, we think the contrary
10 presumption is the correct one, that Congress expected 11 that federal officers would do what they were told, and 12 that if they did not, the remedy available was an action 13 to compel the performance of those statutory duties.

14 QUESTION: Against them.

15 MR. SCHWARTZ: Against -- in their official
16 capacity, though, not an act -- we're not talking 17 Gibbons action here. What we have in mind is --

18 QUESTION: Oh, no. Against them, though, in 19 -- you wouldn't say it was a suit against the United 20 States.

21 MR. SCHWARTZ: I -- I -- technically I think 22 not, Justice White, although since the 1976, I think,
23 amendment of the Administrative Procedure Act it doesn't 24 matter whether you name the defendant the United States
25 or you name the defendant the Secretary of the Interior.

1 QUESTION: But, in any event, you could get 2 only prospective recovery.

3 MR. SCHWARTZ: That's right. And it is our 4 submission that the remedy that was available to enforce 5 these nonmonetary duties was that kind of remedy. And 6 there are a number of reasons why we believe that is the 7 appropriate kind of remedy.

8 Congress, in prescribing nonmonetary duties,
9 has never shown that it appreciated that the Treasury
10 would be held accountable for the -- for the misfeasance 11 of federal officers. Of course, in the context of this 12 case I use those terms because that is what is alleged, 13 and it's never been determined whether there has in fact 14 been any statutory violation.

15 The -- there is another critical point here.
16 The respondents argue that the value to them of 17 performance of these duties which we call nonmonetary
18 was financial; and I assume that that is perfectly 19 accurate. But that in itself is not sufficient to 20 indicate that Congress contemplated the payment of money 21 from the United States Treasury or sanctioned that 22 recovery as is required unless there is evidence that 23 Congress contemplated what would happen if the federal 24 officers did not perform their statutory duties and were 25 allowed to go uncorrected in that course.

1 In this case -- I would also add that this 2 Court's decision in United States v. Testan cannot be 3 distinguished in the manner which is implicitly 4 suggested by this line of argument, because the same
5 argument could have been made in Testan, and if I read
6 the Court's opinion correctly, essentially the same 7 argument was made in Testan.

8 The statute there involved was the 9 Classification Act which established criteria for the 10 grading of federal employees. The value to a particular 11 federal employee such as the respondent, Herman Testan, 12 of such a statute was monetary. It came through the 13 provision of yet another statute which said that if 14 you're rated at GS-12 as a Government attorney, your 15 salary is thus and so. The value to Herman Testan, 16 therefore, of compliance with the Classification Act in 17 his case was monetary as well.

18 But the Court refused to telescope the 19 nonmonetary predicate duty into the monetary duty which 20 lay behind it. The Court instead said you may have an 21 action for injunctive relief, and if you were 22 reclassified as a GS-14 attorney, then you may recovery
23 the salary to which you would be entitled; but Congress 24 has not authorized the recovery of damages for your 25 misclassification.

1 The same analysis applies here. An injunctive
2 action may be available to compel the Secretary to alter 3 his practices, if in fact they're improper, in the 4 oversight of sales of Indian timber. And if that is 5 done, the provision which Justice O'Connor pointed out 6 requiring the payment of proceeds will then round an 7 action to make sure that those proceeds are paid. The 8 two steps cannot be divided, and that we take to be the 9 teaching of Testan.

10 In a sense this case stands on a -- this case
11 is an easier case, we would submit, for the Government
12 than Testan, because in Testan if the nonmonetary duty 13 of proper classification were properly performed, the 14 higher salary that would be owing to the Respondent
15 would come from the Treasury.

16 In this case had the Government performed the 17 nonmonetary duties that it is alleged to have improperly 18 performed in a more suitable manner, the extra sums 19 earned would have come from those who would have paid 20 for the timber. Therefore, there is no reason at all to 21 expect that Congress contemplated the United States
22 would be liable. The two kinds of obligations are far 23 less fungible than those involved in Testan. The 24 respondents would substitute the answerability of the 25 United States in money damages for sums that should have

1 been garnered from a contractor who purchased Indian 2 timber. And we submit that that is an additional reason 3 why it should not be inferred from a silent legislative 4 record and a silent statute that Congress contemplated 5 the recovery of money damages for -- where proceeds were 6 not actually earned.

7 I'd like to turn briefly to the actual 8 statutes involved here. There are quite a number, and 9 frankly, this matter is not terribly susceptible of oral 10 presentation, and I'll likely rely heavily on the briefs.

11 It is important to know, however, that there 12 are a number of separate statutes involved here for 13 different kinds of claims, that they can't be grouped 14 all together. It's also interesting, so far as I can 15 discern, the respondent has not even answered our 16 argument respecting some of the statutory claims. I 17 don't find any arguments made in defense of the Court of 18 Claims' holding that Section 318(a), which authorizes 19 the appropriation of funds for building of roads on 20 Indian reservations, somehow grounds an action for 21 recovery of damages. I suppose it would be a very 22 serious thing if a routine authorization statute allowed 23 individuals who might be benefitted if the 24 appropriations were made, would ground an action for 25 recovery of damages.

1 The main statute at issue here, however, is 25
2 U.S.C. 406(a), which governs the sale of timber on 3 Indian allotments. The first thing to observe, of 4 course, is that there is no mention of damages in the 5 statute itself. And as I've said, while there is a 6 mention of an obligation to pay out certain monies, the 7 proceeds of the sale, there is no mention of any duty to 8 pay out any other monies. The other duties are 9 nonmonetary.

10 A few other points are relevant to considering 11 whether Congress could have intended that the United 12 States be answerable in money damages under this 13 statute. The first is that until 1964, the statute was 14 a rather bare instrument. It's reproduced in Footnote 3
15 at page 3 of our brief. And until 1964 the statute 16 simply said the timber on any Indian allotment held 17 under a trust or other patent containing restrictions on 18 alienations may be sold by the allottee with the consent 19 of the Secretary, and the proceeds shall be paid over.

20 It is difficult to imagine how Congress could 21 have thought that that statute imposed any -- created 22 any opportunity to recover any money other than the 23 actual proceeds. There was no standard that the 24 Secretary was directed to adhere to. There were no 25 criteria for sale.

1 And I would also point out that under the 2 statute prior to 1964, as today, the power to sell 3 timber actually was given to the individual and not to 4 the Secretary. It was the Secretary's consent. The 5 Secretary was to act as a constraining influence.

6 Now, the Government does not deny, as this 7 Court's opinion in White Mountain Apache v. Bracker
8 makes clear, that it -- the Secretary actually 9 undertakes a rather comprehensive role. But that role 10 in this case, as respondent has made quite clear, was 11 made possible not by the statute alone, but by the 12 powers of attorney which were signed here which granted 13 the allottee's authority to sell timber to the 14 Secretary. And as we've argued in the briefs, those 15 powers of attorney don't themselves ground an action for 16 damages. What is relevant is that Congress, which 17 talked in terms of the allottee selling timber, could 18 scarcely have contemplated that the Government would be 19 liable for the Secretary's mismanagement.

20 The -- I think I'd prefer to leave the balance 21 of the detailed statutory argument for the briefs. The 22 key point is that rather than engage in anything like 23 the kind of analysis that we've laid out, which we 24 submit is the reanalysis required by the decision in 25 Testan, the Court of Claims proceeded by an entirely

1 different route.

2 It built on -- it proceeded by three 3 extrapolations of the existing law, each of which we 4 submit to be erroneous. The first was the idea that a 5 statute need not prescribe either the recoverability of 6 damages or require the payment of money to ground an 7 action for compensation.

8 The second is that even though the statutes 9 involved here do not in term speak of trust duties, that 10 Indian -- statutes governing the management of Indian 11 property generally should be understood to have a trust 12 character.

13 And third is it is necessary that -- that 14 given the existence of a trust duty that damages be 15 recoverable.

16 It may well be, and the decisions of this 17 Court suggest, that statutes governing the 18 responsibilities of the Government pertaining to Indian 19 property are to be read with a fiduciary clause, but 20 none of those decisions suggest that that is in itself a 21 sufficient basis for recovery of damages.

22 And it is a very serious matter, we submit,
23 when the Court of Claims suggest that even though 24 Congress did not address itself to a trust character of 25 the duty that that trust character of the duty is

1 somehow sufficient to ground an action for damages. If 2 Congress had said the Secretary shall hold these lands
3 in trust and pursuant to that trust manage these lands 4 and assure that the highest return is earned for the 5 allottees pursuant to prudent and professional forestry 6 management practices, that might be a different matter.
7 But Congress has not created such a trust, and even if 8 it had, the question would still remain did Congress 9 foresee the recoverability of damages.

10 The effect of the Court of Claims reasoning
11 interpolating trust duties, and further, interpolating a 12 damages remedy into a silent statute and legislative 13 record is to engage in that kind of judicial legislation
14 that was condemned by this Court's decision in Testan, 15 as well as the private right of action cases that we've 16 referred to which we think provide a cognate line of 17 authority.

18 The Court in Testan said that it should not 19 tamper with established principles because it was 20 thought that they should be made responsive to a 21 particular conception of enlightened Government policy.
22 And that, we submit, is exactly what the Court of Claims
23 has done here. It is for Congress and for Congress 24 alone to prescribe the availability of damages against 25 the United States.

1 For these reasons and the reasons stated in 2 our written decisions, the decision of the former Court
3 of Claims should be reversed.

4 CHIEF JUSTICE BURGER: Mr. Hobbs.

5 ORAL ARGUMENT OF CHARLES A. HOBBS, ESQ., 6 ON BEHALF OF THE RESPONDENT

7 MR. HOBBS: Mr. Chief Justice, and may it
8 please the Court:

9 The opinion you're going to write in this case 10 will be the seventh reported opinion in the history of 11 this long case. The question now is simply this: When 12 the United States takes control and custody of Indian 13 property, in this case timber, and sells it for less 14 than its market value, must the Government make good 15 that loss, or is the Indian without remedy for that 16 loss? If you rule, as the Government urges, that there 17 is no remedy in damages, then there is no remedy at all.

18 Before turning to the Government's points, I'd 19 like to state the background of this case in our terms.
20 These Indians aboriginally used and occupied the Olympic 21 Peninsula of Washington and the area south of that which 22 is an area covered by dense forest. In the 1850s the 23 Government made a treaty with some of these Indians, and 24 as to the rest of the Indians who refused to sell their 25 land, who refused to sign that treaty, the Government

1 simply took over the land and thereafter treated it as 2 if they had signed the treaty.

3 A reservation was established in the middle of 4 this aboriginal territory for all of these Indians, 5 those who signed the treaty and those who did not, and 6 in time that reservation was divided pursuant to the 7 General Allotment Act of 1887 into small 80-acre
8 allotments. Each Indian got one allotment. All of this 9 is well covered, and it's got a map showing aboriginal 10 territory in the brief we filed three years ago when 11 this case and this question were first before you.

12 Now, each trust allotment was a formal 13 statutory express trust under the General Allotment Act
14 of 1887. Now, it's true, as you said three years ago, 15 that nothing in the General Allotment Act said anything 16 about timber management duties. That's because the 17 Allotment Act was not for the purpose of giving 18 timberland to Indians; they couldn't work that. The 19 purpose of the act was to give them farmland or grazing
20 land.

21 And in this case that was not possible, so
22 what the Indians got was property that there was no way
23 that they personally could work the land. It was just a 24 happenstance that they came from a part of the country 25 where there was not enough farmland to go around.

1 Now, since this was trust land, the Indians
2 couldn't sell their timber, even if they were 3 knowledgeable about it and even if they wanted to sell
4 it. Congress was aware of this, and in 1910 --
5 incidentally, Indians who own trust allotments are in a 6 small minority nationwide. Nationwide, most Indians
7 have trust allotments that are farmland or grazing
8 land.

9 In 1910 Congress had heard that the Indians 10 weren't getting any revenue out of their timber, and 11 that was an unfortunate thing, and Congress ought to do 12 something about it. So Congress passed the Act of 1910, 13 which is the principal act upon which we rely. That act 14 says that the timber on these trust allotments can be 15 sold by the Indian with the consent of the Secretary.

16 Now, merely consenting to the sale of the 17 timber doesn't on its face sound like the Secretary is 18 being given much authority to manage and sell this 19 timber; but it really does mean that in practice. When 20 you look at what's involved in selling timber, which is 21 you require a high degree of know-how and you require 22 resources to get the timber out of there. Selling and 23 logging timber is a sophisticated process, and it can't 24 be handled by an untrained person.

25 To his credit, the Secretary realized this,

1 and right from the beginning he interpreted the 1910 Act
2 as giving him the authority to manage these timber
3 sales, and that's what he did. He wrote very extensive 4 regulations beginning in 1911, the year after the act,
5 and he employed a large staff to manage these sales.
6 You referred to this same comprehensive management
7 system in White Mountain Apache v. Bracker which you 8 decided three years ago.

9 I might add that starting in 1920, Congress 10 authorized the Secretary to begin charging a fee for his 11 services, and the Secretary did so. He enacted 12 regulations that permit fees up to 10 percent.

13 In 1941 some of the Indians objected to this 14 comprehensive control that the Secretary was exercising 15 over their land, and they went to court. They sued for 16 an injunction to make the Secretary stop exercising all 17 this control over their land which they felt was not 18 good management. The Ninth Circuit said that the 19 Secretary's interpretation of the act was correct.

20 In 1946 Congress amended the 1910 Act -- 21 excuse me, 1964 -- Congress amended the 1910 Act, and 22 they made explicit at that time some of the factors that 23 the Secretary had already read into the 1910 Act, such 24 as the need to maintain the productive capacity of the 25 land and the best interests of the Indian allottee.

1 There are other relevant statutes such as 2 those requiring the Secretary to manage the timber on a 3 sustained yield basis. That was contemplated actually 4 in the 1910 Act, but it wasn't made an express statutory 5 command until 1934.

6 Another one is the suite of statutes
7 authorizing the Secretary to grant rights-of-way to 8 outsiders across Indian land upon payment of 9 compensation. Still another is authorizing him to 10 invest timber proceeds and other money for the benefit 11 of the Indians.

12 Incidentally, that's not a statute calling for 13 interest. It's a statute calling for investment, and 14 the investments are limited to federal securities.

15 These statutes are all part of one statutory 16 program. The basic act is the General Allotment Act 17 which established the trust, which admittedly with 18 respect to timber was a bare trust.

19 The statutes supplementing the General
20 Allotment Act are, as I've said, the 1910 Act, the 1964 21 Act amending it, the 1934 sustained yield act, the 22 right-of-way acts, and the interest acts -- excuse me, 23 the investment acts.

24 Now, so far I've been talking about individual 25 Indians. The tribe owns timber also, and they are a

1 plaintiff in this case also. As to them, the Secretary 2 treated their timber essentially the same as he did the 3 tribal timber under another section of the 1910 Act.

4 The tribal timber was not held in trust under 5 the General Allotment Act, but it was held in trust
6 under other acts. One act was the Indian Reorganization
7 Act of 1934, and there were several other special acts
8 whereby Congress made direct grants of land to the tribe
9 in trust for the tribe. These are cited in our brief.

10 Now, none of the tribal trusts spelled out any 11 particular duties either any more than the General 12 Allotment Act did. So the duties that we argue are 13 present were infused into these trusts by the 14 supplementary, same supplementary acts that I've just 15 mentioned.

16 The first time we were here three years ago we 17 argued that the fact that the United States held the 18 land in trust for the Indians was enough just by itself 19 to ground them, to ground their right for damages for 20 trust mismanagement.

21 You said no, the trusts taken by themselves 22 don't spell out any duty to manage timber, so first we 23 have to find some statutory basis for a duty to manage 24 timber. And then you said assuming we can do that, we 25 also have to show that the -- the other statute that

1 we're relying on that bring out these duties must be 2 fairly interpreted as mandating compensation for the 3 damage sustained under the Testan rule.

4 We went back to the Court of Claims, and the 5 Court of Claims agreed after argument and re-argument, 6 both times en banc, they finally agreed 6 to 1 that the 7 statutes I mentioned supplementing the General Allotment
8 Act did impose duties to manage timber and could fairly 9 be interpreted as mandating compensation for the damage 10 sustained.

11 Now, here's the difference between the 12 majority of the Court of Claims and the dissenting 13 judge. The dissenting judge felt with the supplementary 14 statutes that I mentioned, the 1910 Act and so forth 15 that supplement the General Allotment Act, could not be 16 fairly interpreted as requiring compensation except to 17 the extent that -- and I think this is a fair 18 characterization of what he said -- except to the extent 19 that they would support an action for liquidated 20 damages. He didn't use the term "liquidated," but 21 that's what he meant. He meant where you can tell the 22 amount of damages without much difficulty.

23 The majority, on the other hand, was unwilling 24 to be that narrow. They felt if the total trust program 25 showed a presently existing legal right to revenue, as

1 they did, at least in the case of those allotments that 2 had been logged, that would be enough to permit a suit
3 for damages to cover the revenues properly -- improperly 4 diminished or the value of the principal improperly lost.

5 The court was narrow in other respects,
6 however. It threw out our claims for consequential 7 damages, as it called them, and certain claims which 8 involved Government discretion. It limited us strictly 9 to claims for value lost.

10 I now begin my argument, and the content of my 11 argument consists primarily of the reasons why our case 12 is different from the Testan case and meets the 13 standards laid down in that case.

14 QUESTION: Mr. Hobbs, do you agree with the 15 Solicitor General that there is perhaps an ambiguity and 16 perhaps confusion in nomenclature among our cases as to 17 whether you're talking about the Tucker Act as a simply 18 jurisdictional basis or as an implied waiver?

19 MR. HOBBS: Yes, Justice Rehnquist. I'm not 20 confused. You simply said it two different ways, and 21 they both can fly.

22 QUESTION: It's just we who are confused.

23 MR. HOBBS: I wouldn't even say that. I would 24 say that the --

25 QUESTION: We haven't admitted it anyway.

1 MR. HOBBS: To me what you've said is the 2 Tucker Act -- you've said sometimes the Tucker Act is a 3 waiver of sovereign immunity, but you need further 4 waiver of sovereign immunity when you're dealing with a 5 damage claim. And you have to show that the statute 6 under which you claim contemplates, impliedly or 7 expressly, a remedy of damages. That's our case, and 8 that's our problem, is trying to show that our statutes 9 do contemplate a remedy in damage.

10 They don't expressly, obviously. If they did, 11 we wouldn't be here. And obviously, equally obviously, 12 they don't have to say it expressly; otherwise, you 13 wouldn't have had the case. You would have said the 14 last time that there is no express allowance; therefore, 15 there's nothing further to argue about. So there must 16 be room to argue implication in this case. And indeed, 17 that's exactly what the language "fairly interpreted"
18 means in your Testan case. "Interpreted" means there's 19 some room for interpretation.

20 QUESTION: But if -- if -- if -- Mr. Hobbs, if 21 it's a question of implying a damages remedy or a cause 22 of action for damages, then we are -- even though the 23 United States is involved, doesn't it raise the -- 24 generally the same sort of questions as whether other 25 statutes contemplate an action in damages; in short,

1 whether you should -- whether an implied right to 2 damages exists under statutes generally?

3 We've been having, as you know, in the last 4 few years quite a succession of cases with respect to 5 that issue, and -- and maybe the law is in somewhat 6 transition.

7 MR. HOBBS: Well, you're referring to the 8 court-type cases?

9 QUESTION: Yes.

10 MR. HOBBS: Implied private right of action.

11 Well, those are a different animal than our 12 case. Those are piggyback cases. That's where Congress 13 passes a public law, and along comes a private person, 14 and he says that this enables me to sue, too.

15 Here, we're dealing with statutes that deal
16 directly with these plaintiffs here, and in fact --

17 QUESTION: Well, that may be so, that may be 18 so, but the question still remains did the Congress 19 anticipate a damages action.

20 MR. HOBBS: Yes. That was one of four 21 elements that you laid down in the court case. Here, 22 it's the only named --

23 QUESTION: Well, why shouldn't whatever test
24 we've evolved for deciding whether the statute 25 contemplates a damages action, whatever that standard

1 is, why shouldn't it be applicable here?

2 MR. HOBBS: Perhaps it should be. I'm going
3 to give you a number of factors that I think make this 4 case sui generis from those dealing with public rights 5 generally.

6 Here, we have private rights. These Indians
7 were given private rights by express intent of Congress, 8 and they're trying to sue on those rights. We think 9 that the correct law consists --

10 QUESTION: Well, they want to sue on them.
11 The Government says they may sue on them but can only 12 get an injunction. The question still remains about 13 damages.

14 MR. HOBBS: Of course. That's -- that's all 15 we're addressing ourselves to. The Government admits we 16 have the rights, and they admit that we have the remedy 17 in equity, but they don't admit that we have the right 18 to damages. That's, of course, what we're talking about 19 today.

20 QUESTION: Yes.

21 MR. HOBBS: And I'm going to give you the 22 reasons why we think that it all adds up to where 23 there's a compelling inference that Congress must have 24 intended that these Indians have damages.

25 We think the correct statement of the law

1 consistent with what you said in Testan is this: Well, 2 if the Court finds that Congress authorized the 3 Government to take the Indian property in trust, which 4 it did here, and operate the trust so as to generate 5 income, which it did here, or protect the value of the 6 property, which is also true here, then that alone 7 creates the cause of action for damages, which can be 8 adjudicated under the Tucker Act.

9 For jurisdictional purposes the trust fills 10 the same purpose as the contract does in the typical 11 contract case. The Tucker Act is not what says you have 12 a cause of action under a contract. The contract is 13 where you find that cause of action. And so here, you 14 find the cause of action in the trust. We don't claim 15 we find it in the Tucker Act, and you've made that clear 16 that that's not where it exists.

17 For jurisdictional purposes the trust fills
18 the same office as the contract does in a contract 19 case. The question of what duties were breached in the 20 course of operating that trust or contract we would have 21 thought, our preference would have been to have that 22 litigated after the case begins, because so often these 23 duties are closely interwoven with the facts; and it is 24 a problem of judicial administration to try to pull that 25 problem out and deal with it first, and then if you win

1 that, go on to your merits.

2 To us, the proper law should be that if you 3 prove the existence of the trust and that it has some 4 duties, then you're past the jurisdictional hurdle; then 5 you must show that those duties required action that the 6 Government didn't take or prohibited action that the 7 Government did take, and if so, how much the loss of 8 value was.

9 Now, the Court of Claims held that that was 10 the correct law, starting with the Klamath case in 11 1966. So when we filed our case in 1971, that had been 12 the law expressly for five years, and the Court of 13 Claims after that Klamath case in 1966, a dozen cases 14 had ruled to that effect up until your Testan case when 15 the question arose that we're now discussing.

16 That's also true in a number of other federal 17 courts. The Moose case, which we've cited in our brief, 18 decided by the Ninth Circuit, both the majority and the 19 dissenter thought that the existence of the trust was 20 all you needed to get through the Tucker Act. That case 21 was decided after Testan and Mitchell, and therefore 22 considered itself in harmony with both of your opinions.

23 The Whiskers case in the Tenth Circuit, also 24 cited in our brief, that was decided after Testan but 25 before Mitchell. They said that if you prove the trust,

1 you have proved all you need to to get into court. And 2 there are two additional district courts, different 3 district courts, different judges, in California who 4 have also ruled to the same effect.

5 And that was the view of the three dissenting 6 Justices, I believe, as I read them, when this case was 7 here before. But the majority of you seemed to feel 8 that the question of what duties the trust imposed was 9 part of the Testan analysis and therefore a threshold 10 issue that had to be adjudicated before the merits were 11 reached to see if they mandated compensation.

12 I have to express the hope that once the law
13 is sorted out, if it is sorted out in our favor, that it 14 would be possible to handle that question during the 15 trial of the merits rather than as a preliminary 16 question.

17 Now, I come now to the part of my argument.
18 The Government says the ultimate question here is one of 19 congressional intent. We agree. If Congress had said 20 what it wanted, we wouldn't be here; so we have to look 21 to secondary sources to see what Congress intended, and 22 the intent we're looking for is an intent that these 23 plaintiffs have money damages for the vindication of 24 their right, which everyone concedes that they have.
25 They have the right but -- they have the right, but the 1 question is whether it's vindicable in damages.

2 QUESTION: Money damages against the 3 Government.

4 MR. HOBBS: Yes. And, of course, underlying 5 every point I make is well, how is our case different 6 from Testan. Well, first of all I'm going to go through 7 eight points.

8 The first point is that there is the trust
9 relationship here which was not present in the Testan
10 case. Congress created a trust in 1877. Then it 11 infused additional duties into that trust in 1910 and 12 after. As this Court held in the Bracker case, the 13 purpose of that trust, or at least the management of the 14 timber in trust, was to generate for the Indians 15 whatever profit the forest was capable of yielding.
16 That's a quotation from your White Mountain Apache, 448
17 U.S. 149.

18 These regulations dealing with this trust
19 timber were approved by the Ninth Circuit in the Eastman 20 case in 1941. When Congress creates a trust, we submit 21 that Congress intends whatever remedy is necessary to 22 carry out that trust, if the trust is breached. Since 23 the purpose of this trust was to generate money, it 24 follows that Congress' intent following the purpose of 25 the trust was to make up for that money if the

1 Government by improper action caused a loss of that 2 money.

3 In Testan you didn't have a trust. In fact,
4 you didn't even have a contracted employment.

5 The second point is this: If you feel that 6 more than the bare trust is required, well, it so 7 happens that we have an actual glimpse of the intent of 8 Congress, the actual intent of Congress here.

9 In 1946 Congress passed the Indian Claims 10 Commission Act, and part of that was what we call the 11 Indian Tucker Act. The Indian Tucker Act was in effect 12 a repetition of the Tucker Act and made applicable to 13 Indians. And the legislative history clearly shows that 14 they expected Indian breach of trust suits to be brought 15 under that act for damages.

16 I'd like to read you a couple of quotes in our 17 brief. If you want to follow them with me, it's on page 18 28 of our red brief. I think the language is so strong 19 I'd like to have it before all of us.

20 The sponsor of this act and the provision
21 we're talking about was Henry Jackson of Washington, now 22 Senator Jackson. He said in the course of the debate
23 that, "The Interior Department itself suggested that it 24 ought not be in a position where its employees can 25 mishandle funds and lands of a national trusteeship

1 without complete accountability. Let us see that the 2 Indians have their fair day in court so that they can 3 call the various government agencies to account on the 4 obligations that the federal government assumed."

5 And the House report, following the same 6 trend, said, "If we fail to meet these obligations by 7 denying access to the courts when trust funds have been 8 improperly dissipated or other fiduciary duties have 9 been violated, we compromise the national honor of the 10 United States."

11 I don't see how you can read that language and 12 conclude that Congress didn't intend for breach of trust 13 actions involving damages to be brought under the Indian 14 Tucker Act.

15 QUESTION: Well, but that would all be -- if 16 you read the Indian Tucker Act that way, then Mitchell 17 was wrongly decided, wasn't it?

18 MR. HOBBS: I can't speak to that. That's a 19 complex question. But it is a fact that the Indian 20 Tucker Act has a legislative history showing that it was 21 intended that suits brought under it for breach of trust 22 could -- could be brought.

23 My third point is the negative inference. In 24 the Testan case the claimant was seeking back pay. Now, 25 Congress had carefully spelled out what remedy you get

1 when you're misclassified, and one of the remedies it
2 did not mention was back pay. There was another
3 possible act, the Back Pay Act, but that clearly did not 4 apply because it only applied to people who were removed 5 from a position they held. It did not apply to people
6 like Testan who didn't hold the position.

7 Well, if Congress says if the Government
8 breaches its duty you get to do A, that's an implication 9 that they thought about and didn't intend for you to get 10 B. So there's a negative inference present in Testan 11 that's not present here.

12 I think that the next point, my point number 13 four, supports that, buttresses it. Testan was claiming 14 a right not known in common law. He was claiming a 15 right created by Congress, which was the right to equal 16 pay for equal work.

17 Now, it's reasonable to say for a right that 18 was created in the beginning by Congress with no
19 comparable rights in common law, it's reasonable to say 20 what remedy did Congress want when it created this new 21 right. And I think it was fair to ask in the Testan
22 case that if Congress is going to create a right, it'd 23 better then spell out what remedy it wants to go with 24 this new right; otherwise, we're at sea. We don't know 25 what kind of remedy Congress wanted.

1 But what about our case? Our case involves a 2 trust relationship, which is very well known in common 3 law. We think that the proper presumption is that when 4 Congress recognizes a right, creates a right, if you 5 like, but a right well known in common law such as this 6 trust right, that it intends the ordinary and usual 7 remedy for breach of trust, unless it gives some 8 indication to the contrary, which it did not do in our 9 case. Of course, common law for a breach of trust, 10 damages is the absolutely regular remedy.

11 Five, the canons of construction. You've 12 ruled many times that the canons of construction call 13 for construing statutes in favor of Indians when those 14 statutes are intended for the benefit of Indians, as 15 these are. And that includes cases where the Indian 16 interests are in competition with those of the United 17 States, as here. Our Footnote 23 lists some of the 18 cases so holding.

19 Our point six is present right versus future
20 right. Testan only had a future right. He had to first 21 get classified to where he said he should be before he 22 had a right to money. We have a present right. Once 23 the Secretary started to log our timber, we had a right 24 that it be done properly. Therefore, we're like 25 Wickersham, a case you cited in the Testan case, where

1 he held his position and was removed from it, and 2 therefore had a present right to be paid.

3 Point seven is consideration. We're paying a
4 good price to have the Secretary perform these services, 5 whereas this is not a gratuitous action -- service
6 provided by the Secretary. In addition to actual money 7 consideration, there's another consideration point that 8 has been recognized by President -- all Presidents since 9 President Nixon and by many cases, and that is this:
10 These lands are part of the great transaction with 11 Indian tribes. When the United States took over lands 12 from the Indians, it made a bargain, which has been 13 recognized by the courts even though the treaty may not 14 have said it in so many words. And the bargain was:
15 You come under our protection. We'll take the land you 16 don't need, and we'll educate you and bring you to the 17 point of competency; and in the meantime we'll hold your 18 land in trust.

19 The eighth one, the final point I want to 20 make, is the intent of Congress that you found in the 21 Capoeman case -- and Capoeman is one of the plaintiffs 22 in this case -- that was a tax refund case, and you held 23 that there was an implied exemption to the federal 24 income tax because when Congress set these lands aside, 25 it did not intend that their value be depleted by taxes.

1 Well, it seems that we have the same situation
2 here. If Congress intended that the trust property be 3 undepleted by federal taxes, doesn't it follow that it 4 shouldn't be depleted by federal mismanagement?

5 Why should our case be any different -- this 6 is a new line of argument -- why should our case be any 7 different because our property is timber rather than 8 money? If we had money, we could sue for breach of 9 trust, for failure to manage the money properly. That's 10 the Moose case, the Whiskers case, the dissent below
11 admits that. How can you justifiably draw a distinction 12 between timber and funds, especially when the purpose of 13 managing the timber is to generate money?

14 And finally, as we've made out in our brief, 15 we have a contract here. The power of attorney, which 16 is reproduced at Appendix 1 of our red brief, appoints 17 the United States to be the agent of the allottee and to 18 sell his timber and to "do all, perform every act 19 necessary and requisite to the consumation of the 20 sale." That means the whole panoply of actions that the 21 Secretary did. And that power of attorney also 22 authorizes the Secretary to charge a fee for that 23 service.

24 Now, we think there was a meeting of the minds 25 here; that the allottee expected not only that his

1 timber would be managed, but that it would be managed 2 competently. We can look to the legislative history of 3 the 1910 Act for that conclusion. The Government spells 4 it out pretty well in Footnote 25, showing that the 5 question of whether the Secretary was going to be a 6 competent manager was an important point during the 7 legislative history.

8 These Indians had a right under the 1910 Act 9 to competent management, and that takes expression in 10 the power of attorney that's reproduced in our brief.

11 If the Court has no further questions, that 12 concludes my argument.

13 CHIEF JUSTICE BURGER: Very well.

14 Do you have anything further?

15 ORAL ARGUMENT OF JOSHUA I. SCHWARTZ, ESQ.,

16 ON BEHALF OF THE PETITIONER -- REBUTTAL

17 MR. SCHWARTZ: Briefly, Mr. Chief Justice, two 18 points.

19 The first is that respondents' argument
20 proceeds as though the statutes in issue here expressly 21 declared a trust. That is not the case. Their text 22 does not support that reading. And as I understand 23 respondents' argument, the view is that these statutes 24 expanded the General Allotment Act trust, but none of 25 the statutes refer to the General Allotment Act; and

1 it's clear that all of the statutes apply to properties
2 that are not subject to the General Allotment Act.

3 The statutes are either adequate on their own
4 or not to create a damage remedy, and there's simply no 5 nexus that's apparent from the statutory language or the 6 legislative history that would suggest this was a 7 congressional attempt to expand the General Allotment
8 Act duties.

9 If I can return to the question of the 10 relationship between this and the private right of 11 action cases, we agree that there is much in common 12 between the two lines of analysis, and in both the rule 13 is, as the Court said in Touche Ross and Reddington, the 14 ultimate question is one of congressional intent. And 15 the Court's refusal in Testan to go beyond that intent 16 speaks to the same kind of analysis.

17 But we would add that the private right of 18 action cases rarely distinguish between damages remedies 19 and injunctive remedies, and that because of the 20 background of sovereign immunity there's an extra layer 21 of -- an extra requirement of special clarity that 22 Congress intended a damages remedy so that the showing 23 -- the showing required in the ordinary private right of 24 action cases should be applied especially strictly in 25 this context.

1 CHIEF JUSTICE BURGER: Thank you, gentlemen.
2 The case is submitted.
3 We'll hear arguments in the next case at 1:00.
4 (Whereupon, at 11:57 a.m., the case in the 5 above-entitled matter was submitted.)
