ORAL ARGUMENT OF	PAGE
MARK I. LEVY, ESQ., on behalf of the Appellant	3
JOHN R. BENN, ESQ., on behalf of the Appellees	23

1 QUESTION: Yes.

2 MR. LEVY: The Social Security Act provides 3 spousal benefits based on the earnings record of the 4 applicant's spouse. The provisions for wives' and widows' 5 benefits were enacted in 1939, the provisions for 6 husbands' and widowers' benefits in 1950.

7 From the time spousal benefits were first
8 established, the Act has contained a Social Security 9 offset provision. That provision requires that were an 10 applicant is entitled to more than one benefit under the 11 Social Security Act, those benefits will be offset against 12 each other so that in net effect the recipient or the 13 applicant will receive only the higher of the two 14 benefits.

15 For example, if an applicant is entitled to 16 spousal benefits and also to retirement benefits based on 17 his own work account, the spousal benefits will be reduced
18 by the amount of the direct benefit to which the applicant 19 is entitled.

20 Until the statute at issue in this case, the Act 21 contained no comparable provision for people, primarily 22 government employees, who worked in employment that was 23 not covered by the Social Security system.

24 In March 1977, this Court decided the Goldfarb
25 case and invalidated the gender-based eligibility standard

1 in the Social Security Act that required men, but not 2 women, to prove dependency in order to be eligible for 3 spousal benefits.

4 As a result of Goldfarb, spousal benefits,
5 therefore, were extended to non-dependent men.

6 In practice, this did not --

7 QUESTION: Who extended it?

8 MR. LEVY: I don't believe that the issue of 9 extension versus nullification was ever directly litigated
10 in this Court.

11 QUESTION: Who extended it, the Secretary or --

12 MR. LEVY: Believing that that to be the result
13 that follows from the decision of this Court, the benefits 14 were extended.

15 That, in practice, did not prove to be a problem 16 for the Social Security Trust Fund with respect to 17 non-dependent men who worked in employment covered by 18 Social Security. Those men usually were entitled to 19 higher benefits on their own work account than on the 20 account of their spouse.

21 Because the Social Security Act has an 22 eligibility requirement providing that a spousal applicant
23 must have no or only minimal benefits in his own account
24 and because of the offset, the Social Security offset
25 provision that already existed in the Act, in fact, no

1 spousal payments were generally made to this group of 2 non-dependent men.

3 It was a far different situation, however, for 4 non-dependent men who worked in employment that was not 5 covered by Social Security. As to this group, spousal 6 benefits, in fact, were payable, and because they were not 7 subject to the existing Social Security offsets, since 8 they weren't employed in work covered by Social Security, 9 those spousal payments were the full, unreduced amount and 10 were not adjusted in any way to reflect their government 11 pension.

12 This caused a windfall for this group of 13 non-dependent men. Because they did not meet the 14 eligibility standards set out by Congress in the Social 15 Security Act, they did not expect to receive spousal 16 benefits and they could not have planned their retirements 17 in reliance on the receipt of such benefits.

18 The Goldfarb decision threatened to impose a 19 very serious financial drain on the Social Security Trust 20 Fund. Congress responded to this problem by enacting the 21 government offset pension provision that is now before the 22 Court. In this provision, parallel to the Social Security 23 offset that was already in the Act for covered employment, 24 this provision provides that the spousal benefits, that 25 the level of spousal benefits will be reduced by the

1 amount of the government pension to which the applicant is 2 entitled and receives payment based on his own work 3 record.

4 The offset provision, the government pension
5 offset provision at issue here applies to spousal benefits 6 that are payable based on valid applications filed on or 7 after December 1, 1977, which was the effective date of 8 the new offset provision for government pensions.

9 Now, the government pension offset provision was 10 a reasonable and a permissible solution to the financial 11 problems confronting the Social Security Trust Fund
12 following Goldfarb. But, in enacting this provision, 13 Congress became concerned about a different problem.
14 Congress became concerned that the elimination or 15 reduction of dual benefits that would be caused by 16 applying the new government offset provision to people who 17 had planned -- Well, to people who had retired or were 18 close to retirement and who had planned a retirement in 19 accordance with pre-Goldfarb law that allowed for 20 unreduced spousal payments. Congress felt that the 21 application of the offset to these people would have 22 imposed a hardship on them and been unfair to them.

23 So, to allay this concern, Congress enacted a 24 specific exception to the government pension offset. The 25 exception provides -- The exception applies to people who

1 are retired or are eligible for retirement from government
2 service in the five-year period between December 1977,
3 when the Act was passed, and November 1982, and who could 4 meet the requirements of the Social Security Act in effect
5 and being administered in January of 1977.

6 The offset and the exception clause also contain 7 a severability provision. This provides that if the 8 exception is held to be invalid in any respect, the offset 9 itself will remain in effect and that the exception will 10 be eliminated in its entirety rather than extended to new 11 people.

12 The severability clause reflects Congress'
13 overriding concern with the financial health of the Social 14 Security Trust Fund and its intention to subordinate 15 retirees' reliance interests to that end if it turned out 16 that the exception as drafted proved to be invalid.

17 Appellee in this case retired from the United 18 States Postal Service in November 1977. He receives a 19 government pension. In December 1977, he submitted an 20 application for spousal benefits based on the work record 21 of his wife who had been employed in a covered job; that 22 is it was covered by the Social Security system, and who 23 was insured under the Social Security program.

24 Appellee's application was considered to be 25 filed as a valid application as of January 1978 when he

1 reached the age of 62 and, thus, first became eligible
2 spousal benefits.

3 The Social Security Administration found that 4 Appellee was eligible for spousal benefits.

5 QUESTION: Was he dependent or what?

6 MR. LEVY: He was not dependent. Because he 7 filed his application after the effective date of the 8 offset provision, he was subject to the offset and 9 because, and it is undispute, he was not dependent on his 10 wife, he was not within the protection of the exception
11 clause. Therefore, in the end, the offset applied to him, 12 and because the amount of his government pension exceeded 13 the amount of his spousal benefits the offset required 14 that there were no net spousal benefits payable to him.

15 After Appellee exhausted his administrative 16 remedies, he brought this action under Section 405(g) of 17 the Social Security Act. The District Court struck down
18 both the exception provision and also the severability 19 clause.

20 The Court found that the exception provision
21 incorporated the gender-based dependency test that existed
22 in the Social Security Act in January 1977 prior to this 23 Court's decision in Goldfarb.

24 QUESTION: The Court was right about that,
25 wasn't it?

1 MR. LEVY: Excuse me?

2 QUESTION: The Court was right about that,
3 wasn't it?

4 MR. LEVY: That the Act did incorporate,
5 absolutely. Appellee has raised an issue of statutory 6 construction here and it is addressed fully in our brief.
7 I don't propose to discuss it unless the Court has 8 specific questions about it.

9 But, there are two important constitutional
10 issues. The first, as I say, is that the District Court
11 struck down the exception clause because it incorporated 12 the gender-based dependency standard.

13 In addition, the Court also struck down the 14 severability clause because the severability clause 15 required that the offset remain in effect without 16 qualification, and, therefore, a plaintiff who 17 successfully challenged the exception clause would not 18 receive any monetary relief in the form of unreduced
19 spousal benefits.

20 Let me turn first to the issue of the exception 21 clause. As Justice White points out, and as we discuss in 22 our brief, we think it is clear that the exception does 23 incorporate the gender-based dependency test that existed
24 prior to Goldfarb. But, a gender-based test is not 25 necessarily invalid, rather, as this Court's decisions

1 have recognized, it is permissible if it serves an 2 important governmental objective and if it is 3 substantially related to the achievement of that 4 objective. We think that the exception clause in this 5 case meets both of those criteria.

6 QUESTION: Is it quite correct to say that is 7 entirely a gender-based clause? It does include -- The 8 exception clause hits both -- rather preserves the benefit 9 for both the retired female government employees and also 10 for dependent spouses for female employees.

11 MR. LEVY: Well, that is correct, and it
12 actually is somewhat more complicated than that. Before I 13 get into the details, let me say that in the end it does 14 include a gender differentiation.

15 QUESTION: And the burden of proof.

16 MR. LEVY: On the burden of dependency, that is 17 right.

18 QUESTION: But, as far as whose money is 19 involved, if you get all the facts on the table, there are 20 both men and women who are benefited by it.

21 MR. LEVY: There are both men and women who are 22 benefited. At the same time, there are men who are not 23 benefited, would be benefited if they were women. And,
24 for that reason, and because the intent of Congress is so clear 25 argue that it is not subject to review as a gender-based

1 standard.

2 But, to follow up on your observation, Justice
3 Stevens, there are both men and women who are eligible
4 under the pre-Goldfarb law and their reliance interests
5 are protected. Similarly, because of the effective date
6 provision of the Act, any non-dependent men made eligible 7 as a result of Goldfarb, who filed a valid application for 8 benefits prior to December 1977, are also protected. In 9 other words, they are not subject to the offset by virtue
10 of the effective date provision. Both of those classes 11 are protected.

12 On the other side of the line, there is one 13 group of women who are not eligible for benefits under 14 pre-Goldfarb law but are now eligible for such benefits.
15 That is the group of divorced wives and surviving divorced 16 wives who were married more than ten but less than twenty 17 years. Because they were not eligible under pre-Goldfarb 18 law, they do not come within the exception, and,
19 therefore, are subject to the offset.

20 In addition, non-dependent men after Goldfarb 21 who make no claim of reliance on that decision, who were 22 unaware of it or admit that it did not enter into their 23 thinking at all, are also subject to the offset. They had 24 no reliance interests to be protected.

25 So, there are men and women on both sides of the

1 line of the offset and the distinguishing characteristic 2 between them is the reliance interests of the category in 3 which they fall.

4 The protection of reliance interests as those 5 lines suggest was the very purpose that Congress had in 6 mind in enacting the exception provision. Congress was 7 concerned in particular about the reliance interests of 8 retirees who had planned their retirements in accordance 9 with the long-standing provisions of the Social Security 10 Act that Congress had passed and that had been on the 11 books since 1939.

12 The legislative record makes clear that this is 13 the purpose that Congress actually had in its collective 14 mind in enacting the exception.

15 There was no sexist animus or motivation on the 16 part of Congress here. Congress did not indulge in 17 archaic or stereotypical assumptions about the role of 18 women in our society and did not adopt the exception based 19 on reflexive or uncritical habit. In this case, Congress 20 knew full well what it was doing and it based the 21 exception on the historical fact of reliance pre-Goldfarb
22 law.

23 QUESTION: Mr. Levy, do you think it would make 24 any difference if instead of a five-year period, that 25 Congress had extended it to cover up to the year 2010 or 1 something?

2 MR. LEVY: Well, it might make a difference. It
3 would depend in part on why Congress did it and what the 4 expansion was. But, we think, if anything, the five-year 5 period was on the short rather than the long side of the 6 permissible spectrum given the nature of retirement 7 earnings. Someone who is six years from retirement might 8 well be hard pressed in that relatively short period of 9 time to make up the reliance that has been bashed as a 10 result of the offset.

11 But, Congress felt that five years was 12 appropriate and there is certainly nothing to suggest that 13 that determination was impermissible in any way. It is a 14 line-drawn problem inherent in the situation. It is not 15 itself a gender issue.

16 Now, the protection of these reliance interests 17 that motivated Congress, we submit, is a legitimate and 18 important governmental interest. We think that 19 proposition is sound and self-evident on its face,
20 especially given the nature of the Social Security system
21 and the nature of the retirement planning process.

22 I also think that this Court's decisions in a 23 wide range of areas have recognized reliance interests of 24 much the same sort.

25 It was not improper for Congress to be concerned

1 about the hardship and distruption that would have been 2 caused if the new offset provision were applied to people 3 who were retired or close to retirement and who had 4 planned their retirement in accordance with pre-Goldfarb
5 law.

6 In addition to that purpose being important and 7 legitimate, we also submit that the exception clause is 8 substantially related to the achievement of that purpose 9 and it rests on a reasoned analysis of the statutory 10 classification.

11 Indeed, by incorporating the pre-Goldfarb law in 12 the exception provision, the exception is precisely suited 13 to the protection of that reliance interest.

14 In addition, as Justice O'Connor pointed out,
15 the exception is limited to a transitional five-year 16 period which Congress determined was a reasonable time to 17 protect people against the disruption of their retirement 18 plans.

19 We also would point out that when the exception 20 clause expired by its own terms in December of 1982, and,
21 thus, the pre-Goldfarb reliance interests had then been 22 satisfied, Congress twice reconsidered the offset 23 provision and on both occasions it enacted an 24 gender-neutral provision. We think that confirms what was 25 evident in the initial Act, that Congress limited the

1 gender-based classification to what was necessary to 2 protect the pre-Goldfarb reliance interest.

3 Finally, in enacting the exception and offset in 4 1977, Congress considered other alternatives, but it
5 rejected them as less desirable. The legislative record 6 makes it clear that Congress adopted the offset and 7 exception provisions as a deliberate policy choice in 8 preference to other approaches they might have taken.

9 Now, Appellee seeks to upset Congress' policy 10 choice and makes two arguments that the exception is 11 unconstitutional.

12 First, he argues that the protection of the 13 pre-Goldfarb reliance interest was not a legitimate and 14 important governmental objective.

15 As Congress recognized though, and we think it
16 quite plain, we don't -- The reliance interests of people
17 under the prior law, in accordance with the provisions
18 passed by Congress and in effect since 1939, cannot be so 19 easily dismissed. Such reliance is not discredited in any 20 way by the fact that this Court in Goldfarb ultimately 21 held the statute to violate equal protection.

22 As in cases such as Lemon versus Kurtzman and 23 the Manhart and the Norris decisions, reliance on a prior 24 state of the law, even if that law turned out eventually 25 to be improper or unconstitutional, does not make that

1 reliance illegitimate and does not detract from the 2 importance of protecting the reliance interests that arose
3 under prior law.

4 Appellee also makes a second argument that the 5 statutory classification here is underinclusive because it 6 doesn't protect the asserted reliance interests of 7 non-dependent men who claim to have relied on Goldfarb 8 between the time it was announced in March of 1977, and 9 the enactment of the offset provisions in December 1977,
10 and who did not file a valid application for spousal 11 benefits prior to the effective date of the offset,
12 December 1, 1977.

13 We don't think that Congress was required,
14 however, to recognize this short-lived and new-found
15 reliance interests of men that was based on the extension 16 of benefits following Goldfarb.

17 Congress could conclude, in the context of the 18 pressing need for the offset itself -- and it is important 19 to remember that the offset is the principal provision 20 here to which the exception is a specific exemption -- in 21 that context Congress could concluded that the reliance 22 interest advanced by Appellee was less substantial and 23 less deserving of protection than the long-standing
24 reliance interest under the statute passed by Congress
25 prior to Goldfarb.

1 As Justice Stevens and I discussed before, there
2 are men and women on both sides of the line.

3 The interest that Appellee asserts was based on 4 the Goldfarb decision. Let me come at it this way. That 5 was a very recent decision at the time and Congress could 6 reasonably have concluded that it was unlikely to have 7 lead to widespread and significant reliance.

8 In addition, it was possible, as in fact turned 9 out to be the case, that Congress would pass a statute in 10 response to the Goldfarb decision and that statute would 11 affect the newly recognized claims of non-dependent men
12 such as Appellee. Neither of those considerations applies 13 to the reliance interests of the pre-Goldfarb retirees.
14 And, for that reason, we think the statute is perfectly 15 constitutional to distinguish between those groups and 16 does not raise any constitutional difficulties because it
17 is limited to the interest that Congress found to be more 18 substantial and more worthy of protection.

19 I should go on to say that even if Congress was 20 required to accommodate the interest in some way that 21 Appellee asserts, its failure to do so does not establish 22 that the exception clause as it exists is not 23 substantially related to the protection of reliance
24 interests.

25 Justice Stevens and I discussed before the

1 somewhat complicated application of this statute, the four 2 different groups, the validity of which Appellee doesn't 3 challenge. The only group that Appellee raises is this 4 narrow group of men who relied between Goldfarb and the 5 enactment of the offset provision.

6 Even though that limited group was not taken
7 into account, we think it is clear that there still is a 8 substantial fit between the exception clause and the 9 protection of reliance interests.

10 And, in assessing the substantiality of the fit,
11 it is important again to note that even if Appellees
12 reliance interest had to be included at all, they are 13 still less substantial than the groups that are now 14 protected under the statute, less substantial than the 15 long-standing reliance interest under pre-Goldfarb law 16 and they are less substantial than the interest of 17 non-dependent men who submitted a valid application and 18 were receiving or were entitled to receive spousal
19 benefits between March and December of 1977.

20 Appellee's standard is also one based on a 21 subjective reliance interest. Such a category under the 22 statute would constitute a marked departure from the 23 easily determined objective criteria now in the exception
24 and the offset provisions and would be extremely difficult 25 and burdensome for the government to administer in

1 practice.

2 For all of these reasons, we think the exception
3 clause itself is constitutional.

4 In the event the Court disagrees with that 5 submission, however, it must then address the 6 constitutionality of the severability clause, which, as I 7 mentioned before, provides that if the exception is 8 invalid in any respect, the offset will remain in effect 9 without qualification and the exception to the offset will 10 be eliminated in its entirety rather than extended to 11 people whom Congress did not intend to be within it.

12 The District Court held that the severability 13 clause was unconstitutional because it was a usurpation of 14 judicial authority and, therefore, invalid under Article 15 III.

16 We think the severability clause is plainly
17 constitutional. It is a substantive rule of law governing 18 the distribution of Social Security benefits. It is a 19 rule of law that is to be applied in the event that the 20 exception clause, as Congress drafted it, is held to be 21 invalid.

22 The severability clause reflects Congress'
23 overriding concern with the fiscal integrity of the Social 24 Security Trust Fund is threatened by the decision in 25 Goldfarb and it indicates Congress' intention to

1 subordinate retirees' reliance interests to that paramount
2 end, that the balance struck by Congress in the exception 3 was impermissible.

4 QUESTION: Of course, it did go further than the 5 usual severability clause, didn't it?

6 MR. LEVY: Well, this is a severability clause
7 in the usual sense in two ways. First, it provides that 8 the offset will be severed in its entirety and remain in 9 effect. It also discusses the severability of the 10 exception provision and provides that any remaining valid 11 portions of the exception will not be severed. The 12 severability clause does not always have to be in favor of 13 severability we don't believe. It can just as well, and 14 as Congress found here, be in favor of non-severability.

15 It was a perfectly reasonable goal for Congress 16 to try to protect the Social Security Trust Fund from 17 great liability if it turned out that it could not limit 18 the exception to the group of people that it considered to 19 be most worthy of special consideration.

20 Now, severability is a question of legislative 21 intent. In essence, it is a statement by Congress of the 22 statute it would have enacted, what it would have done, if 23 it had known at the outset that the statute as drafted was 24 unconstitutional.

25 Here, Congress explicitly and clearly defined

1 the scope of the statute it was enacting and we think it
2 acted well within its legislative powers in so doing.

3 In addition, the severability clause is also 4 supported by the decisions of this Court indicating that 5 an underinclusive statute can be remedied either by 6 extension or by nullification of its benefits. Either
7 approach is constitutionally adequate and the choice 8 between those remedial alternatives is a question of 9 legislative intent and that Congress indicated its intent
10 clearly here does not render the severability clause
11 suspect or invalid.

12 I would only note in closing that the District
13 Court felt that there was an Article III standing problem
14 in the severability clause. The severability clause is a 15 rule of law and does not purport to effect the Article III
16 power or jurisdiction of the federal courts. In addition,
17 it doesn't go to the standing of Appellee or any other 18 plaintiff. Appellee has standing because he was subject 19 to the offset and not within the exception.

20 In any event, there is no rule of law that says
21 a plaintiff has to be entitled to monetary relief in order
22 to have standing. On the contrary, we think Appellee
23 unquestionably had standing, notwithstanding the 24 severability clause, to pursue his right to equal 25 treatment.

1 I will reserve the balance of my time.

2 CHIEF JUSTICE BURGER: Mr. Benn?

3 ORAL STATEMENT OF JOHN R. BENN, ESQ.

4 ON BEHALF OF THE APPELLEES

5 MR. BENN: Mr. Chief Justice, and may it please
6 the Court:

7 Before I address Mr. Mathews' arguments on the 8 issues in this case, I would like to preface my remarks 9 with a characterization that has been made on the 10 exception clause. The exception clause has been 11 characterized by the Solicitor as being a transitional 12 device. It is not that. It is a lifetime exemption for 13 everyone who qualifies. Those individuals, those females, 14 those non-dependent females, and those dependent men who 15 get into this window that is created by the exception
16 clause will remain within that window or within that class 17 throughout their lifetime. So, this is not a device that 18 beginning in 1983, this year, will entitle Mr. Mathews to 19 benefits.

20 Please, that characterization is going to be 21 important when you compare the Social Security 22 contributions of the spouses and see the inequality that 23 is achieved under the statute as designed.

24 The fundamental question before this Court is if 25 the exception clause is interpreted in one fashion whether

1 or not there has been a perpetuation of the 2 unconstitutional sex discrimination that occurred in 3 Goldfarb.

4 The statute is important, both to classes of 5 men, as indicated by Mr. Robert Mathews, but perhaps more 6 importantly from a constitutional standpoint from that of 7 Mary Mathews, because it depreciates her Social Security
8 contributions while at the same time provides less 9 financial resources for her family unit than what is 10 provided to a similarly situated male applicant. That is 11 important as far as the focus of this particular case.

12 The fundamental question is divided into three 13 areas. First of all, a statutory interpretation issue, 14 whether or not the exception clause incorporates a 15 gender-based dependency test.

16 The second issue is whether or not there has 17 been a denial of equal protection to Mary Mathews; and,
18 third, whether this Court should extend or nullify the 19 exception clause as stated in the legislation.

20 Directing my attention first of all to the 21 statutory argument, in essence, it is Mr. Mathews' 22 position that there is a statutory basis for affirmance in 23 this case.

24 The Solicitor asked the Court in brief to focus 25 on two items. First of all, the language of the statute,

1 which he said is clear and unambiguous and, second of all,
2 its legislative history.

3 Focusing on the first of those, the language of 4 the statute itself, if the Court will review Section 5 334(g), there is nothing in that statute indicating that 6 dependency is required. It does not per se require 7 dependency.

8 Now, please keep in mind the framework under 9 which that clause was passed. That clause was passed 10 after Congress had known how the Court was going to 11 interpret Section 402(c) of the Social Security Act. In 12 essence, reading out gender-based dependency as being a 13 requirement for spousal benefits.

14 Now, on the other hand --

15 QUESTION: Did you make this argument, Mr. Benn, 16 in the District Court?

17 MR. BENN: No, Your Honor, we did not offer it 18 in District Court, and if I could, perhaps give an 19 explanation. It was not until after we got involved in 20 the case on appeal that we discovered two District Court 21 decisions that were previously not reported and wherein 22 the issue was accepted by the District Courts, and since 23 we had undertaken the appeal or I had undertaken the 24 appeal, we have also had the Ninth Circuit opinion which 25 indicated that the exception clause, by statutory

1 construction, would not --

2 QUESTION: Counsel for your client didn't raise 3 it in this case in the District Court.

4 MR. BENN: That is correct, Your Honor. We do
5 feel though that it is basis on which the case can be 6 affirmed based upon the statutory construction.

7 QUESTION: Mr. Benn, that interpretation though 8 of this statute is just flatly inconsistent with the 9 congressional intent and under those circumstances this 10 Court doesn't apply that canon of construction that you 11 are suggesting.

12 MR. BENN: Your Honor, I think it would be a 13 fair characterization to make that there has been an 14 unfair mixture made in the presentation before this Court
15 of the legislative history. You must separate, please, 16 the history of the pension offset provision. That is not 17 an issue in this case. And, the legislative history of 18 that provision is not an issue.

19 What is an issue will be the legislative history 20 of the exception clause. That has almost no legislative 21 history. At best, it could be characterized as statements 22 by Senator Long and Representative Oldman on the floor of 23 Congress saying this was supposedly going to be the 24 intent. For the minority people in Congress, that may 25 have been the intent.

1 The legislative documents that were produced
2 after passage, the committee reports and the summaries, 3 indicate a more generalization. The exception clause was 4 designed to protect the reliance interests of people.
5 They refer repeatedly, and Footnote 12 of our brief
6 highlights this, to terminology that is non-gender 7 specific and that is the approach that we are taking; that 8 you can give meaning to the statute in this particular 9 case without ever reaching the constitutional issue. And,
10 the is important from the precepts of this Court that 11 constitutional issues should be avoided if there can be a 12 fair alternate construction of the statute. And, although 13 not binding upon this Court --

14 QUESTION: Mr. Benn, is there really much left 15 to the offset clause if you win on this argument?

16 MR. BENN: No, Your Honor. If you recall, Mr.
17 Levy indicated to you at least four classes of 18 beneficiaries that would still be affected by the pension 19 offset provision. The only class that would not be 20 affected by the offset provision by this interpretation is 21 going to be Mr. Mathews or the class represented by Mr.
22 Mathews for spousal benefits. That is husbands.

23 But, there are, indeed, four classes that still 24 will be affected by the pension offset provision.

25 QUESTION: Aren't husbands the main people they

1 are interested in in the offset provision?

2 MR. BENN: Your Honor, I don't believe it is 3 just simply the husbands concerned. We have the situation 4 about the difference in length of divorces as to 5 entitlement and we do have three classes --

6 QUESTION: Well, am I not right that the main 7 group they wanted the offset to apply to was husbands who 8 had supported themselves?

9 MR. BENN: Certainly from the aspect of --

10 QUESTION: That is where most of the money is 11 in the case.

12 MR. BENN: Yes, Your Honor.

13 QUESTION: And, you would reverse the 14 congressional decision as that major group covered by the 15 offset provision.

16 MR. BENN: Your Honor, I think --

17 QUESTION: Isn't that right?

18 MR. BENN: Yes, Your Honor, that is the approach
19 we are taking. However, that would still be an unfair
20 characterization of the legislative intent. The pension
21 offset provision and the effect of the exception clause 22 only effects about five percent of the savings that were 23 intended to be made by the '77 legislation. So, it was 24 not -- It cannot be characterized as the primary purpose 25 of the statute as such.

1 Now, on the other hand, if we interpret -- go 2 beyond the text of the statute, and we go to the 3 legislative history -- I have discussed the legislative 4 is, in essence, non-gender specific with the exception of 5 two remarks made on the floor of Congress. Beyond that 6 the language of the statute itself uses terminology as it
7 affects and being administered in January of 1977.

8 Peculiarly, there is not anything in the 9 legislative history indicating why the date of January 10 1977 was selected. There is nothing indicating that that 11 date has particular importance as opposed to December 1976
12 or February 1977, and until that keystone of construction 13 is reached, there is not necessarily the meaning asked by 14 the Solicitor to be given to the statute.

15 As being administered, that particular portion 16 of the phrase of the statute is also important because the 17 Secretary at that particular time in January of 1977 was 18 not administering the statute to preclude benefits because 19 of dependency. They were administering the statute by 20 simply taking a potfull of applications and holding them
21 in abeyance until the Court made its decision in Goldfarb.

22 Ostensibly, after the Goldfarb opinion was 23 announced, all of those applications for benefits, be they 24 in January of 1977 or for six months prior, were given 25 full force and effect. Those benefits were paid.

1 The second issue in this case deals with an
2 equal protection issue and applies to the case of Mary 3 Mathews.

4 The Solicitor has stated that the standards be 5 applied by this Court, and one which we accept, is that 6 the exception clause must serve an important governmental 7 interest and at the same time the means selected by 8 Congress must be substantially related to the achievement 9 of that important governmental objective.

10 Now, a remark that the Solicitor does not make 11 that is, however, important that when you attempt to 12 analyze the situation, is who must bear the burden of 13 proving that particular standard.

14 The Court has indicated that the burden of 15 proving that the discrimination, if it is there, serves an 16 important governmental purpose and is substantially 17 related, rests upon the Secretary in this instance. It is 18 not a burden that Mr. Mathews has to bear.

19 I will ask the Court then to focus in on the 20 interests and the means selected by Congress. It is our 21 firm contention that reliance interests within the context
22 of this particular case is not an important governmental 23 objective. And, I make that statement with two things in 24 mind.

25 First of all, if you accept that reliance

1 interest is important, then in any case where there has 2 been an equal protection violation most probably there
3 will be a class of people who relied upon that statute.

4 Stated otherwise, there cannot be reliance upon 5 an unconstitutional statute, and that is in essence 6 what --

7 QUESTION: There are a lot of cases against you 8 on that point. Chico County Drainage District, some of 9 the doctrine of Chevron Oil. There are lots of people who 10 do rely on unconstitutional statute, and this Court in 11 different cases has upheld that reliance.

12 MR. BENN: Yes, Justice Rehnquist, however --

13 QUESTION: So why do you say there cannot be 14 reliance on an unconstitutional statute? Were you making 15 a statement of fact?

16 MR. BENN: No, Your Honor. I am making the 17 statement for purposes of analysis and perhaps I could 18 explain it this way. This case is in a different context.
19 This case attempts to protect a reliance interest that was 20 already held unconstitutional by the Court.

21 QUESTION: So was Chico Drainage District.

22 MR. BENN: Your Honor, I am not familiar 23 with that particular case.

24 QUESTION: Well, it was a municipal bankruptcy
25 statute that held unconstitutional by this Court and then

1 later reliance interests were asserted and the this Court
2 in a subsequent case said, sure, it was unconstitutional,
3 but that doesn't mean people don't do things in reliance.

4 MR. BENN: Okay. Your Honor, that would be 5 true, however, this case could be characterized 6 differently, and perhaps from what I am reading from what 7 you told me about that case, that was the judicial 8 acceptance of a reliance interest.

9 In this particular case, we have an attempt by 10 Congress to impose their own interpretation of what 11 reliance interest is upon the Court.

12 QUESTION: Why shouldn't this Court recognize 13 Congress' choice as well as trying to make on of its own?

14 MR. BENN: Your Honor, if there is an analysis
15 by Congress indicating that they have studied the issue
16 and have determined that reliance interest is present, 17 perhaps it could be accepted in that situation.

18 However, please look at this particular case and 19 look at it in light of some principles that the Court has 20 announced. There is nothing in the legislative history
21 indicating that there are such things as reliance
22 interests.

23 Even the Solicitor in brief or the Secretary in 24 brief has had a problem in characterizing those interests.

25 QUESTION: Why was there even an exception then?

1 MR. BENN: Okay. The exception was simply, by 2 our perception, something that Congress utilized in order 3 to buy additional time to study the issue of providing 4 universal coverage under Social Security.

5 QUESTION: Whom were they attempting to benefit
6 by this exception?

7 MR. BENN: Okay. They were attempting to --

8 QUESTION: They must have had somebody in mind.

9 MR. BENN: Yes, Your Honor, anyone who had a
10 legitimate reliance interest. And, of course, in the case 11 of Mr. Mathews, he has actual reliance interests. That 12 is -- What I am attempting to indicate to the Court is to 13 try to distinguish between an expectation interest and a 14 reliance interest.

15 QUESTION: Mr. Benn, may I ask, you mentioned
16 Mr. Mathews' reliance interest. Earlier I thought you 17 suggested the statute was discriminatory against his wife.
18 Which is it, discrimination against males or females?

19 MR. BENN: Okay. The statute is discriminatory
20 against females because it provides less for their Social 21 Security contributions in terms of spousal benefits.
22 However, if you go beyond the equal protection analysis 23 and get into the specifics of what is being offered as the 24 justification for the statute, you are left only with the 25 protection of reliance interests.

1 And, it is our firm contention that there is no
2 such thing as a reliance interest upon, first of all, an 3 unconstitutional law, and, second of all, upon the 4 proposition that I am arguing at this point. That is a 5 pre-Goldfarb state of the law. We have attempted to 6 indicate that. A person who retires and is eligible for 7 this exception clause must do their retirement after 8 December 1, 1977.

9 The Secretary attempts to characterize that 10 after that time period a person who retires is relying 11 upon a state of the law that antedates that decision by as 12 much as ten months or more. At most at that time the 13 people had an expectation --

14 QUESTION: Of course, the argument is you make 15 retirement plans and even employment plans some years in 16 advance and it made a big difference whether you worked 17 for the government or you didn't work for the government.
18 There are a lot of decisions that might be affected over 19 the long run, I suppose.

20 MR. BENN: Yes, Your Honor. However, it
21 attempts to demean the actual protection.

22 Then, in the second issue that I am going to 23 raise and that is the issue of whether or not the statute 24 is substantially related. If you accept for a minute your 25 proposition that there is such things as reliance

1 interest, then in that situation you have a failure of the 2 statute to be sufficiently tailored to protect those 3 reliance interests. And, that is the situation of Mr.
4 Mathews. Mr. Mathews, at the time he first --

5 QUESTION: But, if one distinguishes between an 6 act of Congress on the one hand and reliance on a decision 7 by this Court on the other hand, he is just not on the 8 reliance of the act of Congress class.

9 MR. BENN: Your Honor, he is not in the 10 situation --

11 QUESTION: He is in a different reliance class.

12 MR. BENN: Yes, Your Honor, but he is in the 13 reliance of the state of the law at the time he made his 14 retirement decision. He made his retirement -- He first 15 considered making his retirement decision in September of 16 1977. At that time, the state of the law would entitle 17 him to spousal benefits if he submitted an application and 18 otherwise qualified. He forewent three years of continued
19 employment with the Post Office based upon the statements 20 from the local Social Security office that he would 21 receive benefits. And, for that reason he cannot now go 22 back -- with a change in legislative approach to the 23 question of exception clause -- he cannot now go back and 24 attempt to change that decision and be rehired by the Post 25 Office in order to gain additional three years of 1 employment that he has suffered through.

2 Perhaps more importantly to the overall issue of 3 equal protection is our third argument that we have argued 4 which is the challenge that it presents to the judicial 5 authority of this Court in the area of equal protection 6 analysis.

7 If the Court will allow the Secretary in this 8 instance or allow Congress in this instance to pass 9 legislation to protect reliance interests, then it can 10 perhaps thwart equal protection review because, as we have 11 pointed out and as we have argued, in each and every 12 instance there probably will be some individuals who would 13 have relied upon the ostensible unconstitutional law and 14 could be protected.

15 For example, in the area of desegregation, this 16 similar approach could be analogized to the approach taken 17 in the exception clause by Congress or the states in 18 particular cases indicating that rather follow the Court's 19 decision in Brown, instead, what we are going to attempt 20 to do is we are going to allow protective reliance
21 interests of everyone who bought homes in particular 22 neighborhoods, reliance on the fact that they could send 23 their children to segregated schools, and continue the 24 effect of an unlawful statute and unconstitutional
25 statutes for many years in the future.

1 The third issue that is perhaps the important
2 one that really threatens the Court's authority is in the 3 area of the inverse severability clause. Let me pause for 4 a moment to characterize that clause. It is not the 5 traditional severability clause that the Court has 6 considered. This is an inverse severability clause. It 7 attempts to impose upon this Court a rule of decision in 8 this particular case, not simply to save a remaining 9 portion of the statute.

10 There are three problems that Mr. Matthews can 11 identify with that particular clause. The first deals 12 with the threat to the judiciary and to the process of 13 judicial review. If, on the surface, the clause is 14 accepted as valid, then there is no means for judicial 15 review for what is considered an equal protection
16 violation within this context. Mr. Mathews must go 17 entirely remediless in this particular context of this 18 case.

19 QUESTION: Do you claim -- Do you disagree with 20 the Solicitor General that he lacks -- The Solicitor 21 General says Mr. Mathews would not lack standing to make 22 the challenge he made here however the severability clause 23 is construed. Do you disagree with that?

24 MR. BENN: Your Honor, I disagree with that to 25 the extent that it goes to the issue of remedy. If the

1 inverse severability clause is accepted, then there would 2 be no remedy for Mr. Mathews, albeit there is an 3 unconstitutional violation to him. This brings us to the 4 aspect of whether or not there must be a sufficient remedy 5 for an unconstitutional violation. And, of course, the 6 Court must, in the first instance, examine the legislative 7 history of the statute and we would not argue to the 8 contrary.

9 However, the Court must go a step further.
10 After they have examined the legislative history --

11 QUESTION: Why do you need to get to the 12 legislative history at all in the severability clause? It 13 is perfectly clear that it is applicable, isn't it?

14 MR. BENN: Okay. There is no question --

15 QUESTION: Don't say "okay." Can you answer me 16 yes or no?

17 MR. BENN: Yes, Your Honor.

18 QUESTION: Then let me read you a sentence from 19 the District Judge's opinion and ask you whether you agree 20 with it. On page 8a of the jurisdiction statement, the 21 District Judge says, "The Court is convinced therefore 22 that the severability clause is not an expression of the 23 true congressional intent." Do you agree with that?

24 MR. BENN: Your Honor, I think the argument can 25 be made that --

1 QUESTION: Would you agree with the argument if
2 it were made?

3 MR. BENN: Pardon?

4 QUESTION: Would you agree with the argument if
5 it were made?

6 MR. BENN: Yes, Your Honor, as to the majority 7 of Congress at the time. I certainly would.

8 QUESTION: You don't think the language of the 9 statute then is governing in this case?

10 MR. BENN: Your Honor, I think that when you
11 look at the legislative history -- And I don't consider 12 the language itself is the inexorable command upon the 13 Court. I view the statute as simply being an indication 14 of legislative intent. To that extent, I think it is an 15 unreliable indication when you consider the majority of 16 Congress.

17 And, if you carry it a step further, which is 18 what I am arguing --

19 QUESTION: Well, didn't the majority have to 20 vote for it to pass it?

21 MR. BENN: Your Honor, they did, but at the time 22 that they voted to pass it please keep in mind that they 23 had no written report before them. They didn't have the 24 text of the statute before them. They waived all of those 25 rules in order to pass the particular statute.

1 This is, as best our research can determine, the 2 first instance in which Congress has interposed an inverse
3 severability clause on a piece of legislation. Obviously,
4 in light of the Goldfarb decision, there is some question 5 to the viability of the equal protection basis for the 6 statute.

7 Now, to the extent that we look to the 8 sufficiency of the remedy, it is Mr. Mathews' contention 9 that the remedy in this particular case to him is entirely 10 inadequate.

11 We had a very similar situation that came up in 12 the District Court in the Rosofsky decision based upon the 13 same exception clause, based upon the same principles. In 14 that particular case, the District Court applied the 15 inverse severability clause and in essence required Mr.
16 Rosofsky to go remediless. He had no remedy although 17 there was, in fact, found a constitutional violation.
18 There is no mechanism within the statute, the inverse 19 severability clause, in which Congress explored how they 20 wanted the inverse severability clause to be applied.

21 We have a second problem here and that deals
22 with retroactive benefits. Now, on the one hand, if you 23 accept the principle of the inverse severability clause, 24 it is in direct conflict with Congress' enactment of 25 Section 204(b) of the Social Security Act which says that

1 benefits that are paid in good faith will not be recouped.

2 So, in this particular situation, from 1977 or 3 from the date of the order in this case, December 1979, up
4 until the date of this Court's decision, unless the Court 5 awards relief to Mr. Mathews, all benefits will have been 6 paid to his opposing class in direct conflict with the 7 intent of the inverse severability clause.

8 So, it would seem apparent that the Court must,
9 at the very least, award the class represented by Mr.
10 Mathews retroactive benefits back to the time of his 11 application and only apply prospective nullification of 12 the statute.

13 We would argue in the contrary that the best 14 approach to take at this particular point would be for the 15 Court to simply not nullify the statute, but extent the 16 benefits. At that time they could leave a reasoned 17 decision and analysis to Congress as to how Congress would 18 apply the situation in the future, but award the class the 19 back benefits for the time that they were discriminated 20 against.

21 In summary, there are in essence three issues
22 before the Court. There is, first of all, a statutory 23 interpretation issue which, if accepted based upon the 24 principles that the District Court of the Ninth Circuit
25 have announced, would allow a means in which this Court

1 could avoid a constitutional issue, yet at the same time
2 give some meaning to the statute and give some meaning to 3 the fact that the Court did have the Goldfarb decision 4 which was known by Congress at that time they passed the 5 exception clause.

6 The second aspect requiring affirmance in this 7 situation deals with the violation of equal protection.
8 The violation occurs to Mary Mathews because it provides 9 less benefits for her and her family unit than what it 10 provided to a similarly situated male.

11 On the surface, reliance interest does not seem 12 to be in this context of this case after there has been a 13 decision of unconstitutionality to be an important
14 governmental interest. The statute surely is not narrowly 15 tailored because the class, as indicated by Mr. Mathews, 16 certainly are not offered protection for their legitimate 17 reliance interests that have occurred.

18 The last aspect requiring affirmance is in the 19 area of the inverse severability clause. That is an 20 attempt to thwart judicial review in this case. It would 21 require Mr. Robert Mathews to go remediless, albeit there 22 is an unconstitutional violation of his rights and the 23 rights of Mary Mathews. Unless this Court provides some 24 mechanism which in this case goes back to the Court's 25 initial reasoning in the Westcott decision that the most

1 appropriate remedy in this case must be extension of the 2 benefits. Allow Congress to act after the Court's 3 decision, but until that time, extend the benefits.

4 If there are no further questions, we would ask
5 the District Court's decision be affirmed.

6 CHIEF JUSTICE BURGER: Very well.

7 Do you have anything further, Mr. Levy?

8 MR. LEVY: I have nothing further, Mr. Chief 9 Justice.

10 CHIEF JUSTICE BURGER: Thank you, gentlemen, the 11 case is submitted.

12 (Whereupon, at 11:55 a.m., the case in the 13 above-entitled matter was submitted.)
