1 our economy.

2 It is our contention in this Court that that 3 decision should be reversed, first because it ignores 4 the plain language and leaves our financial system open 5 to precisely the hazards that Congress had in mind when 6 it enacted the Glass-Steagall Act over 50 years ago.
7 Second, it's inconsistent with the specific policy
8 choice that Congress made.

9 When Congress considered the Glass-Steagall
10 Act and the dangers that had given rise to that statute, 11 it had before it the choice of absolute prohibition or 12 case by case regulation with delegation to an 13 administrative agency. Congress rejected regulation and 14 chose absolute prohibition, as this Court has twice 15 noted. For that reason, the court below erred in 16 undoing the specific policy choice the Congress had 17 made.

18 And finally, the decision below represents a 19 bad policy choice that not only is not justified by the 20 statute and by its legislative history, but that, as 21 recent events have shown, will substitute litigation and 22 case by case administrative revisionism for resolving 23 what bank activities are appropriate. This would mark 24 the first time in our history as a country and as a 25 nation that any court has done so.

1 The factual background of this case is 2 relatively simple and straightforward. In 1978 Bankers
3 Trust Company, which is a state bank which is a member
4 of the Federal Reserve System, began underwriting
5 commercial paper notes issued by third party
6 corporations. The Federal Reserve Board ruled that this 7 was legal, not because the statute didn't cover it, but 8 because the statute shouldn't be read to cover it even 9 though its literal terms so provided.

10 The court said -- the Federal Reserve Board 11 said that commercial paper is more like a bank loan, 12 even though it is conceded that the bank is not lending 13 anyone any money in the activity of distributing and 14 underwriting commercial paper.

15 QUESTION: Had the Board ever expressly 16 forbidden such a thing before?

17 MR. PITT: The Board has never expressly 18 forbidden such a thing, because the statute has 19 forbidden it.

20 QUESTION: And because no one has ever asked 21 them before?

22 MR. PITT: That is correct. But I might point
23 out that since the passage of the Glass-Steagall Act no 24 bank has ever underwritten commercial paper?

25 QUESTION: Or even asked to be permitted to?

1 MR. PITT: No bank has asked the Federal 2 Reserve Board to be permitted to do so.

3 QUESTION: Were banks even doing that at the 4 time of the enactment of the Glass-Steagall Act? I kind
5 of sensed in reading the briefs that the Glass-Steagall 6 Act was not directed in its terms to that practice, and 7 I wondered if banks say in the twenties, before the 8 Glass-Steagall Act was passed, actually were doing 9 that.

10 MR. PITT: There were some isolated instances 11 of banks underwriting commercial paper. But by and 12 large, the overwhelming function at the time of the 13 passage of the Glass-Steagall Act was for banks to 14 purchase commercial paper, which is the equivalent of 15 making a loan, and of course there is express authority 16 for banks to do that.

17 In our system banks are permitted to do that 18 which is expressly provided, and they may not do that 19 which is not expressly permitted. In this case, the 20 Glass-Steagall Act takes that regime a step further and 21 says that banks, particularly state member banks and 22 national banks and all banks, may not underwrite 23 commercial paper notes.

24 It is unmistakable from the language of the 25 statute that the statute prohibits the underwriting of 1 notes, and no one disputes that issue in this case. The 2 question is whether the Board is free to say that some 3 notes will be treated in accordance with the literal 4 language of the statute and other notes will not be 5 treated in accordance with the literal language of the 6 statute.

7 QUESTION: Mr. Pitt, you agree with the 8 Government that commercial paper is not an investment
9 security as that term is used in Section 16?

10 MR. PITT: Your Honor, I would state that the 11 Government is correct that commercial paper is not 12 presently defined as an investment security. And I
13 might add here that Section 16 of the Glass-Steagall Act 14 --

15 QUESTION: I'm a little unclear. Is 16 commercial paper an investment security in the meaning 17 of the term in Section 16?

18 MR. PITT: The point I am making, Your Honor, 19 is that the term is not -- that within the meaning of 20 that term, commercial paper is not an investment 21 security because the Comptroller of the Currency, an 22 entity that is not involved in this case, has never 23 defined commercial paper as an investment security.

24 QUESTION: But how about the statute? I mean, 25 was it intended that investment security incorporate

1 commercial paper by Congress?

2 MR. PITT: There is no indication that the 3 statute need exclude commercial paper from that 4 context. It is simply not -- it is not discussed.

5 But the term "investment security", Your 6 Honor, does not have any relevance to the issue in this 7 case. The reason I state that is that we are here
8 dealing with a specific bar. In Section 21 the statute 9 says that it is unlawful for any entity that engages in 10 issuing, underwriting, selling or distributing funds, 11 notes, debentures securities, and other securities from 12 also taking deposits.

13 The term "notes" is specifically used in 14 Section 21 without any qualifier and without any 15 reference to investment securities or otherwise, and 16 thus for this purpose it's irrelevant whether one deems 17 commercial paper to be an investment security or not.

18 Section 16 of the Glass-Steagall Act has a 19 flat prohibition. It says that it shall be unlawful for 20 any national bank to underwrite any issue of securities
21 or stock. There is absolutely no qualification 22 whatsoever in that prohibition.

23 There are provisions in Section 16, however, 24 which indicate -- and this is the critical facet of the 25 structure of the Glass-Steagall Act -- that when

1 Congress wanted to permit banks to underwrite specific 2 securities, it knew how to do so. Appended to Section 3 16 is a laundry list of 15 securities that are in the 4 form of notes that the Congress has directed banks may 5 underwrite.

6 In Section 21, in 1935 Congress amended the 7 provisions of Section 21 specifically to provide that 8 banks might underwrite mortgage notes, because there had 9 been the claim that mortgage notes would be encompassed 10 within the broad prohibition against underwriting any 11 notes. Congress responded in '35 and gave banks that 12 authority and said that the section should not prohibit 13 that.

14 QUESTION: Do you disagree, then, with Judge 15 Wilkie's opinion's reading of the word "notes" in 16 Section 21?

17 MR. PITT: Absolutely, Your Honor. Judge
18 Wilkie's reading, which I think was a narrowing, and he 19 conceded it was a narrowing, of the literal language, 20 suggested that when one looks at the various entities
21 that precede the word "notes" -- the statute reads
22 "stocks, bonds, debentures, notes and other securities"
23 -- that one ought to view "notes" as potentially meaning 24 notes for the raising of capital for permanent purposes 25 for corporations.

1 Where he found those words we are not certain,
2 but they don't appear on the face of the statute.
3 Moreover, he seized upon three factors which he 4 indicated would determine when a note would be within 5 the statute and not. The three factors that he alluded 6 to and that the Board has alluded to in this case are 7 the denominations of the notes, the nature of the 8 purchasers, and whether the notes were of prime 9 quality.

10 None of those things have to do with whether 11 the note is being used to raise capital or not. So that 12 after having totally taken the statute out of context 13 and then relying on factors that bear no resemblance to 14 the specific criteria he applied, he concluded that 15 commercial paper notes were not within the statute.

16 QUESTION: This is his functional analysis?

17 MR. PITT: This is his functional analysis and 18 the Board's functional analysis. And I might add that 19 that functional analysis is precisely what the evil in 20 this case is, because it substitutes a regime of case by 21 case regulation for what Congress decided ought to be an 22 absolute prohibition.

23 This is one of the instances in that period of 24 legislation in which Congress said: We will not rely on 25 Government regulation; we want prohibition; and when we

1 think a bank ought to be able to engage in activity, we 2 will so specify. And there have been numerous examples 3 of those specifications.

4 As I have indicated, in the relevant universe
5 of the statute, Sections 21 and 16, there are two major 6 categories that Congress deals with in the 7 Glass-Steagall Act. One are the instruments to which 8 the Glass-Steagall relates, and second are the 9 activities which are prohibited.

10 A careful review of the statute shows that 11 both the instruments to which the statute relates and 12 the activities prohibited are all-encompassing. There 13 are no activities that are not governed by this 14 statute.

15 One need only look at the listing of terms --
16 stocks, bonds, debentures, notes, and other securities
17 -- to understand that Congress had in mind all 18 instruments by which corporations obtain any form of 19 capital.

20 Second, when one looks at the specific 21 activities in the statute, it is equally clear that 22 Congress parsed out and covered every conceivable 23 activity that a bank could engage in in the context of 24 these instruments. It dealt with purchasing, selling, 25 issuing, underwriting, distributing.

1 The statute is unmistakable in terms of its 2 breadth and its scope.

3 QUESTION: Mr. Pitt, very naturally you're 4 emphasizing the language that's found in Section 21, 5 rather than the language in Section 16. In your view, 6 is Section 16 totally redundant?

7 MR. PITT: No, Your Honor, it is not totally 8 reduniant. Section 16 by its terms applies only to 9 national banks. Section 21 applies to any 10 deposit-taking institution. Both contain co-equal 11 prohibitions on underwriting, but Sections 16 and 21 12 have different formulations with respect to certain 13 activities of banks that are not involved in this case.
14 For example, with respect to investment securities, 15 there are distinctions that are made in Section 16 that 16 are not made in Section 21 for different types of 17 entities.

18 But both provisions are unmistakable in 19 providing the universe of deposit-taking institutions, 20 that they may not underwrite notes or other securities.

21 QUESTION: Well, 16 doesn't refer to notes?

22 MR. PITT: I'm sorry, Your Honor?

23 QUESTION: 16 doesn't refer to notes, does 24 it?

25 MR. PITT: 16 refers to the broader term of 1 securities.

2 QUESTION: Right.

3 MR. PITT: And one need only look to Section 4 21 to indicate that the term "securities" obviously must 5 include notes by virtue of the form of Section 21, which 6 starts with stocks, bonds, debentures, notes, and then 7 says "and other securities." It is clear that Congress 8 intended a note to be a security within the meaning of 9 both provisions.

10 QUESTION: But certainly not all notes, 11 though, are included?

12 MR. PITT: I'm sorry?

13 QUESTION: I assume that all notes are not 14 covered by Section 21. Certificates of deposit or loan 15 participations or bankers acceptances, maybe even cash, 16 they're not included, are they?

17 MR. PITT: Your Honor, this case only involves 18 commercial paper. But the scope of the term "notes" 19 means any notes. For things like certificates of 20 deposits and other legitimate banking functions, there 21 are specific and permissible activities. All of the 22 normal functions that banks have always performed, even 23 with respect to commercial paper, are provided for in 24 the banking laws.

25 But the term "notes" used in Section 21 is as

1 broad as any note. Witness the exemption for mortgage
2 notes.

3 QUESTION: No, but if you were right there 4 would then be conflicts with other sections of the 5 banking laws, I suppose.

6 MR. PITT: No, that is not correct. There are 7 no legitimate banking functions -- and the Government 8 has not referred to any. The Government has in the 9 context of this case attempted to establish that certain 10 activities, some of which are questionable, may be 11 foreclosed by this Court's decision. I think there are 12 two simple answers to that.

13 First, this case only involves commercial 14 paper, notes that are clearly within the meaning of the 15 statutory term, not only because they fit literally but 16 because there's contemporaneous Congressional evidence
17 that Congress intended commercial paper to be included 18 within the scope of that statute.

19 QUESTION: What about a bank which, instead of 20 underwriting notes in the language of Section 21, were 21 to simply issue -- is a certificate of deposit a note 22 that's issued by the bank?

23 MR. PITT: A certificate of deposit is, and 24 banks have express authority to issue notes.

25 QUESTION: So that the prohibition against

1 them issuing notes in Section 21 somehow doesn't prevail
2 over the other language?

3 MR. PITT: The prohibition in Section 21 has 4 to be read with respect to the express authority that 5 banks are also granted, and banks are granted the 6 authority to discount and --

7 QUESTION: Well, perhaps I haven't adequately
8 read the briefs. Where else are these express 9 authorities granted, and what's the point of having 10 Section 21, which prohibits a bunch of stuff, if it's 11 all granted somewhere else?

12 MR. PITT: Well, first of all, with respect to 13 national banks Section 16 sets forth the express powers 14 of those banks. With respect to state member banks, 15 many of the restrictions and provisions of Section 16 16 are provided to state member banks.

17 Section 21, which deals with any depository
18 institution, is basically silent as to the affirmative 19 powers of depository institutions, and that means that 20 whatever affirmative powers they have, as this Court has 21 --

22 QUESTION: But it's not silent as to what it
23 prohibits, I take it.

24 MR. PITT: That is correct.

25 QUESTION: It prohibits any organization

1 engaged in the business of issuing notes from taking 2 deposits.

3 MR. PITT: Section 21 defines a depository
4 institution within its terms as one that may issue 5 certificates of deposits and other instruments for the 6 conduct of banking business. If you look at the precise 7 language of Section 21, Your Honor, it defines the term 8 "deposit-taking institution" as an institution that 9 receives deposits subject to check or to repayment upon 10 presentation of a passbook, certificate of deposit, or 11 other evidence of debt.

12 Within Section 21 itself, it expressly 13 recognizes that these are traditional banking functions 14 and uses them to define the entities that are within its 15 prohibition.

16 QUESTION: Well, but then a bank that does 17 that sort of business, that receives deposits, along 18 those lines, can't issue a certificate of deposit?

19 MR. PITT: That is correct. A bank that 20 receives deposits may issue a certificate of deposit, 21 but it may not -- one of the questions is it may not 22 engage in a marketing scheme. It may obtain funds from 23 individual investors, individual depositors in return 24 for a certificate of deposit which bears interest. That 25 is expressly contemplated by Section 21 and it's

1 expressly within the purview of other affirmative 2 banking statutes.

3 QUESTION: Did I understand you to say that 4 they must hold that certificate, then? The relationship 5 between the bank and the holder of the CD, what about 6 that?

7 MR. PITT: Whether they need to hold that --

8 QUESTION: Can you describe that relationship 9 other than, obviously, a debt?

10 MR. PITT: Well, the certificate of deposit in 11 that case is held of course by the depositors.

12 QUESTION: Did you describe that as a note in 13 response to Justice Rehnquist?

14 MR. PITT: I'm not certain I'm following Your 15 Honor.

16 QUESTION: Is it a note of the bank when it's 17 held?

18 MR. PITT: It is in form a note of the bank 19 when it is held by the depositor. In form it is. But 20 it is not a note that the bank is underwriting or 21 engaging in any prohibited activity, because banks raise 22 capital by issuing notes and that is a permissible
23 activity within Section 21.

24 The contemporaneous legislative history of the 25 Glass-Steagall Act I think makes quite clear that

1 commercial paper is both a note and a security for 2 purposes of these prohibitions. We start with this 3 Court's decision in the Camp case, which held that the 4 term "security" should be construed broadly, not just 5 literally but broadly and flexibly to accomplish its 6 purpose.

7 Indeed, in the four decisions of this Court
8 that have defined terms in the Glass-Steagall Act this 9 Court has continually urged that those terms are not to 10 be given a narrow or restrictive reading, but are to be 11 given a broad reading. In this case, we simply urge 12 that they be given at a minimum their literal reading, 13 as well as accomplishing the regulatory purposes.

14 The structure of the Glass-Steagall Act, as 15 I've indicated, confirms that "notes" were intended to 16 have its plain meaning. In addition, if one looks at 17 other legislation, both contemporaneously and other 18 banking legislation, it is clear that when Congress 19 wanted to qualify the types of notes that it was 20 restricting it knew how to do so.

21 For example, there are statutes in which 22 Congress refers to capital notes. Section 16 itself 23 refers to notes commonly known as investment securities, 24 for which there is a limited authorization of purchase.
25 The fact of the matter is that in every instance in

1 which Congress wanted to restrict the scope of its 2 prohibitions it said so and it did so plainly.

3 Moreover, one need look at the securities 4 laws, which were enacted at exactly the same time and by 5 exactly the same Congress and by exactly the same 6 committees to understand that Congress clearly 7 understood commercial paper to be a note. In the 8 Securities Act of 1933, Congress specifically defines 9 "security" to include any note.

10 Senator Glass, one of the architects of the 11 Glass-Steagall Act, went before the committee when it 12 was considering the '33 Act and suggested that perhaps 13 the Congress ought to exclude commercial paper, 14 specifically commercial paper, from the provisions of 15 the Securities Act. Congress rejected that suggestion, 16 but adopted a narrow prohibition against requiring 17 registration. It exempted commercial paper for the 18 registration requirements of the federal securities 19 laws.

20 QUESTION: Well, Mr. Pitt, do you contend that 21 the definitional provisions of the Securities Acts of 22 '33 and '34 carry over to the Glass-Steagall Act, which 23 really doesn't have any definitional sections like 24 that?

25 MR. PITT: The answer is they are most

1 certainly relevant, Your Honor. They clearly evidence 2 --

3 QUESTION: Well, does that mean they do or do 4 not carry over?

5 MR. PITT: They -- let me say this, that both 6 statutes were enacted to deal with the same abuses and 7 evils, and they approach the problem from different 8 ends. With respect to the Glass-Steagall Act, the 9 Glass-Steagall Act prohibits banks from engaging in the 10 securities business.

11 One presumably would look to the federal 12 securities laws to define what the securities business 13 is. It was the same committee and the same Congress, 14 dealing with the same evils, that adopted both 15 statutes.

16 The Board itself in its ruling indicated that 17 the definitions and provisions of the Securities Act 18 were clearly relevant. They have argued that they are 19 not dispositive.

20 I am raising the Securities Act in this Court
21 simply to indicate that Congress understood that when it
22 used the term "notes" and when it used the term 23 "securities" that that would include commercial paper 24 unless it exempted it.

25 When one goes back to the Glass-Steagall Act

1 and sees the broad definitional terms that were used, 2 and that literally encompass commercial paper, one has 3 to go a long way to find a basis for excluding out of 4 the statute that which Congress has expressly recognized 5 would otherwise be included.

6 Beyond that, in 1935 when Congress amended the 7 Glass-Steagall Act with some technical amendments, 8 Congress did put in an amendment to Section 21 of the 9 Glass-Steagall Act, as I have indicated, allowing banks 10 to underwrite mortgage notes. Again, if "notes" did not 11 mean all notes and certainly not long-term capital 12 raising notes, there would have been no need for the 13 exemption for mortgage notes.

14 Congress a day earlier amended -- adopted the 15 Public Utility Holding Company Act of 1935. In that 16 statute Congress said that public utility holding 17 companies were prohibited from purchasing securities.
18 However, it excepted such commercial paper and other 19 securities as the SEC might permit by regulation.

20 In each instance, both in '33 and in '35, when 21 Congress dealt with the terms "notes" and "securities", 22 it understood that commercial paper would be included 23 unless it was specifically excluded. There was no
24 specific exclusion here, and so the Board has relegated 25 -- arrogated to itself the capacity to exclude it on its

1 own. That we submit is what the Board may not do.

2 QUESTION: Mr. Pitt, let me ask you a
3 question. I think it may be similar to one Justice 4 Rehnquist asked. Supposing a bank issues a group of 5 unsecured notes, not mortgage notes. Somebody borrows
6 money from the bank and they get notes in exchange. Can 7 they discount those notes to another bank?

8 MR. PITT: Yes. Banks specifically have the 9 authority --

10 QUESTION: There's an express statutory
11 provision?

12 MR. PITT: -- to discount and negotiate
13 notes.

14 QUESTION: There's an express statutory
15 provision?

16 MR. PITT: Expressed in Section 16, yes.

17 The Board's efforts basically to avoid the 18 plain language really relate not so much to any reliance 19 on the literal language of the statute, but to a 20 disagreement with the policy that Congress formulated -- 21 an effort, in essence, to change the structure of the 22 statute.

23 The Board adopted a functional analysis in 24 which it suggested that any instrument which might be 25 functionally similar to a traditional commercial banking

1 operation or which displayed the economic 2 characteristics of a commercial loan should be 3 permissible for the Board to exempt out of the statute.
4 There are two immediate problems with that.

5 The first is that the statute does not say 6 this and it gives the Board absolutely no regulatory 7 power under either Section 16 or 21. I want to stress 8 that the Board of Governors has absolutely no power to 9 regulate under either of those two provisions.

10 QUESTION: I suppose, though, that a 11 regulatory agency's interpretation of a statute is of 12 some significance for us?

13 MR. PITT: Your Honor, there is no doubt that 14 an agency's interpretation of a statute which it is 15 charged with administering is entitled to some 16 deference.

17 QUESTION: Particularly in a field as 18 complicated and specific as this one is.

19 MR. PITT: There is no doubt, Your Honor, that 20 that general policy certainly obtains, but it does not 21 obtain here for the simple reason that the Board is not 22 engaged in interpretation here. The Board is engaged in 23 regulation.

24 I say that because if the Court refers to not 25 only the Board's statement, but also its lawyers'

1 explanations of that statement before the courts below
2 -- and particularly I am referring to pages 136 and 192
3 of the joint appendix -- the Board has continually said
4 that it reserves the right -- and I may now quote:

5 "The Board did not say that any one particular 6 fact was determinative. The Board did not say that all 7 short-term notes were not securities. It did not say 8 that all non-speculative notes were not securities. The 9 Board's determination is based on this particular 10 combination of the factors involved. If the factors 11 change, then the Board's conclusion is very likely to 12 change."

13 I submit, Your Honor, that that's not 14 interpretation, that's regulation.

15 I would like to reserve the rest --

16 QUESTION: Your contention is that 17 Glass-Steagall didn't set up the sort of regulatory 18 regimen that the SEC did, where you have an agency 19 actively policing and perhaps changing definitions?
20 Glass-Steagall is just a set of prohibitions?

21 MR. PITT: That is correct. That is precisely 22 our contention.

23 CHIEF JUSTICE BURGER: Mr. Claiborne.

24 ORAL ARGUMENT OF LOUIS F. CLAIBORNE, ESQ.,

25 ON BEHALF OF RESPONDENTS

1 MR. CLAIBORNE: Mr. Chief Justice, may it
2 please the Court:

3 All those of us who have persevered through 4 the several briefs filed on both sides and by the allies 5 of Petitioners and Respondents must come away with the 6 sense that two quite different statutes are being 7 discussed, both purporting to be the Glass-Steagall 8 Act.

9 The one that is pictured by Petitioners and 10 their allies is an uncompromising ban on the marketing 11 of anything by commercial banks. All the emphasis in 12 their briefs is on the activity or the transaction which 13 the Act prohibits, with no attention to the character of 14 the instrument that is being dealt with.

15 But unsurprisingly, the Glass-Steagall Act is 16 not quite that simple. To be sure, sometimes the 17 prohibitions of the Act do turn on the kind of business 18 activity involved. For instance, where stock is the 19 security in question, banks may act as brokers for their 20 customers, but they may not purchase stock, shares of 21 stock, for their own account.

22 That indeed is the difference, as we read it, 23 between the two most relevant decisions of this Court, 24 ICI I and ICI II, as they're referred to.

25 QUESTION: Mr. Claiborne, it would help if

1 you'd raise your voice a little.

2 MR. CLAIBORNE: I'm sorry, Your Honor.

3 But on the other hand, as often, the 4 prohibitions of the Act depend on the character of the 5 instrument, and the most obvious example is shown in the 6 provision which exempts Government bonds and Government
7 insured bonds from any of the prohibitions of the Act.
8 They may be underwritten, they may be sold, they may be 9 distributed, they may be purchased without limit by a 10 commercial bank. Not so with respect to bonds not 11 issued by Government or not insured by Government.

12 The short of it is that there is no universal 13 prohibition in the Glass-Steagall Act against 14 underwriting or marketing. It depends on what sort of 15 instrument is at stake.

16 The question here as we view it is whether 17 commercial paper is wholly outside the prohibitions of 18 the Glass-Steagall Act. We do not claim an exception, 19 an exemption in the Act. Our straightforward position
20 is, the Glass-Steagall Act has nothing whatever to do 21 with commercial paper. It was not intended to.

22 So far as the Glass-Steagall Act is concerned, 23 commercial paper can be bought, sold, underwritten, 24 marketed, framed, used for kindling, absolutely
25 indifferent to the Act.

1 QUESTION: Well, you do suggest that the word
2 "notes" doesn't include commercial paper.

3 MR. CLAIBORNE: Indeed, and because the word
4 "notes" --

5 QUESTION: You mean it doesn't include the 6 kind of notes represented by commercial paper?

7 MR. CLAIBORNE: It doesn't include the kind of 8 notes represented by commercial paper any more than it 9 includes the kind of notes represented by bankers 10 acceptances or certificates of deposit.

11 As I say, the Act is --

12 QUESTION: Well now, if you're right the 13 limitations placed on the type of commercial paper that 14 can be marketed are irrelevant, because they wouldn't 15 have to impose those limitations to make commercial 16 paper marketable.

17 MR. CLAIBORNE: Justice O'Connor, when I say 18 commercial paper is not covered I focus on the kind of 19 commercial paper issued in very large denominations, not 20 to the public but to sophisticated buyers, and for very 21 short term, which is involved in this case --

22 QUESTION: Well, but if --

23 MR. CLAIBORNE: -- and which is the only kind 24 of commercial paper that banks, that any bank has sought 25 to deal in.

1 QUESTION: Sure. But it appears that your 2 argument would reach any kind of commercial paper.

3 MR. CLAIBORNE: It may, and it may be that the 4 guidelines which the Board has issued in this case,
5 which are not guidelines issued under the Glass-Steagall 6 Act -- those are guidelines issued under the power of 7 the Federal Reserve Board to assure against unsafe and 8 unsound banking practices.

9 Those guidelines, as the Court of Appeals said 10 in the last footnote of its opinion, are not limitations
11 under the Glass-Steagall Act, but they are assurances 12 that, since the Board invoking other authority will not 13 permit banks to go beyond the kind of dealing involved 14 here, the Court need not reach the question whether the 15 Glass-Steagall Act of its own would indeed prohibit some 16 different kind of dealing in some different kind of 17 commercial paper.

18 QUESTION: So the term "notes" in Section 21 19 is kind of an accordion-like thing, depending on what 20 authority the Federal Reserve Bank gives to people like 21 the bank here?

22 MR. CLAIBORNE: Justice Rehnquist, no, the 23 word "notes" in Section 21 must mean the same thing.
24 But if the word "note" does not encompass commercial 25 notes beyond those involved in this case, the Federal

1 Reserve Board is nevertheless entitled as a matter of 2 its policing authority over banks to prohibit dealing in 3 those other kind of notes, even though they're not 4 covered by Section 21.

5 QUESTION: Well, why shouldn't the word
6 "notes" in the language of Section 21 of the 7 Glass-Steagall Act be given its normal meaning?

8 MR. CLAIBORNE: Well, "normal" is perhaps 9 jumping to the conclusion too quickly, Justice
10 Rehnquist. The word "note" appears in Section 21 in a 11 list which includes bonds and debentures and stocks.
12 Bonds and debentures, as we know, are long-term notes.
13 The perhaps most natural way to read Section 21 is to 14 say to oneself, the word "note" must include something 15 like a bond or a debenture, something of relatively long
16 term --

17 QUESTION: Well, why is that logical? It 18 seems to me if you have three words and two of them are 19 long term, it would be perfectly reasonable to say, 20 well, they must have put the third term in to mean short 21 term.

22 MR. CLAIBORNE: I'm only suggesting that one 23 of the ways of construing an enumeration of words is to 24 define each by the company it keeps, and not to suppose 25 that there's a sudden jump to an entirely different sort

1 of financial instrument.

2 QUESTION: But in that sequence of words, the 3 first word is "stocks", which of course are very 4 disparate from bonds or debentures.

5 MR. CLAIBORNE: But there is this in common 6 between stocks and the bonds and the debentures: they 7 are all things in which it is customary to view 8 investment activity, whereas short-term commercial paper 9 is not the sort of thing in which people invest.

10 They are not, also, offered to the general 11 public, unlike bonds, debentures and stocks, which have 12 that in common, that there are public offerings.

13 But this is not the only reason why "notes" in 14 Section 21 ought not be given the broad reading.
15 Section 21, after all, is not the section addressed 16 directly to banks; it's Section 16. And we oughtn't to 17 read into Section 21 anything that isn't in Section 16 18 as a prohibition.

19 Indeed, there's a proviso to Section 21 which 20 tells us precisely that: Nothing which is permitted in 21 Section 16 is prohibited by this section,
22 notwithstanding, in effect, the broadness of the terms
23 as some untutored person might read it.

24 It is natural to attempt to avoid a clash
25 between the two sections. Now, when we look at Section

1 16, we cannot reach the conclusion that commercial paper 2 is a security within the meaning of that section, and 3 the demonstration is quite simple.

4 We know that commercial paper is not an 5 investment security. We know that as a matter of common 6 sense, but we also know it because those words are 7 derived from the McFadden Act and we have the 8 legislative history of the McFadden Act, in which there
9 is an express exchange in which the Congressman said, 10 no, commercial paper is not viewed by anybody as an 11 investment security, and when we are legislating about 12 investment securities we do not mean to include
13 commercial paper.

14 QUESTION: Mr. Claiborne, that really sounds
15 amazingly simple, clear as a bell, and I just can't 16 understand why it took bright bank lawyers so many years 17 to discover that Glass-Steagall Sections 25 or 21 had 18 absolutely nothing to do with this.

19 MR. CLAIBORNE: Your Honor, it didn't take 20 bright lawyers so long to come to this conclusion. The 21 fact is that banks had been purchasing commercial paper
22 since long before Glass-Steagall.

23 QUESTION: But they haven't been 24 underwriting?

25 MR. CLAIBORNE: No.

1 QUESTION: Well then, as a matter of fact no
2 other bank had the nerve to start underwriting until 3 this one.

4 MR. CLAIBORNE: Well, that's a matter of 5 economic history, not a matter of legal slowness.

6 QUESTION: Well, I know. But don't you
7 suppose that if the understanding was that banks could 8 underwrite commercial paper they would have been doing 9 it all this time?

10 MR. CLAIBORNE: No. It's against their 11 interests to underwrite when they could earn more by 12 making the loan. Underwriting is the least attractive 13 activity for the bank, in that it's merely getting an 14 agent's fee instead of deriving the much more 15 substantial discount if it were to make the loan 16 itself.

17 So it was with reluctance that banks came to 18 acting as dealers in commercial paper. They much 19 preferred being the issuer, the purchaser, of the 20 commercial paper. It's only when those who were issuing 21 the commercial paper found that banks were unable to 22 provide them the funds that they went elsewhere, found a 23 market elsewhere to sell their paper. And banks 24 gradually, realizing that the business had gone from 25 them, decided the next best thing to do was to attempt

1 to get something out of the transaction by inserting 2 themselves as a dealer.

3 But that is a matter of slow economic reality,
4 not a matter of dull lawyers.

5 QUESTION: Mr. Claiborne, why did that come
6 about all of a sudden?

7 MR. CLAIBORNE: I am not very good at 8 financial history, Justice Blackmun. But my 9 understanding is --

10 QUESTION: You sound pretty good.

11 (Laughter.)

12 MR. CLAIBORNE: -- that because of regulations
13 by the Federal Reserve Board limiting the interest that 14 could be paid by banks, the deposits which they had to 15 lend were limited, and accordingly the demand for funds 16 had to find a source elsewhere and did find it 17 elsewhere, so the banks were no longer the almost sole 18 purchasers of the paper, but insurance companies and 19 others began lending on commercial paper.

20 QUESTION: Well, they wanted to compete with 21 the investment banking industry too, didn't they?

22 MR. CLAIBORNE: As we view it, Justice
23 Blackmun, this is not an investment banking operation.
24 It is an arrangement of a loan, something which is 25 proper for commercial banks to be doing, something

1 traditionally which they have done. It is functionally
2 no different than a sale of a participation in a loan.
3 It is therefore an attempt to recapture some small part 4 of a very traditional commercial banking activity.

5 Now, in our view there are at least three 6 independent supports for the conclusion we draw. First, 7 the literal passing of the statute leads us to the 8 conclusion that, since commercial paper is not an 9 investment security, it therefore must be, if covered, a 10 security. And yet, we know that commercial banks are 11 forbidden to purchase securities, except investment 12 securities. And yet, we know that commercial banks have 13 and may continue to purchase commercial paper.
14 Therefore, commercial paper cannot be a security within 15 the meaning of Section 16.

16 Now, the answer given to this seemingly 17 unanswerable argument is that the purchase of commercial 18 paper is authorized by the first portion of Section 16, 19 which is in fact a holdover from the Banking Act of 20 1864. That is a very awkward way to look about it. It 21 appears that the Glass-Steagall Act was not amending the 22 Banking Act and changing the traditional activities of 23 banks. It was simply turning to a wholly new subject 24 and saying, as the text suggests, now with respect to 25 something else, dealing in securities, the rules shall

1 be the following.

2 And it appears that that category of dealing 3 in securities is nothing to do with the discounting or 4 negotiation of promissory notes, an activity which 5 before and since has been authorized to banks.

6 The legislative history of Glass-Steagall
7 again leads us to the same conclusion. It is no 8 inadvertence that the text fails to deal with commercial 9 paper dealings, because bank purchases of commercial 10 paper were common long before Glass-Steagall and 11 continued to be so afterwards and were so at the time it 12 was enacted.

13 Congress had occasion to focus if it wished to 14 deal with commercial paper, but did not do so. On the 15 contrary, the only mention of commercial paper in the 16 legislative history of Glass-Steagall is a regret that 17 banks have abandoned their good old habits of loaning on 18 commercial paper and have turned to dealing, 19 underwriting, and otherwise involving themselves with 20 speculative securities. And it was against that danger, 21 which had in the view of Congress caused the bank
22 failures, that Congress now turned its face in 1933.

23 QUESTION: Mr. Claiborne, is it possible that 24 a bank could end up in a position of conflict of 25 interest if, for example, take the Penn Central case,

1 banks had lent Penn Central money and also had 2 underwritten and sold its commercial paper, and after 3 the sale of the commercial paper the bank began to 4 think, well, after all, Penn Central is not such a super 5 risk and perhaps we better call the loan? Would it not 6 be then in a conflict of interest position?

7 MR. CLAIBORNE: Justice Powell, one can 8 conceive, of course, of situations in which a bank might 9 --

10 QUESTION: And would an investment banking
11 house have a similar possibility of conflict?

12 MR. CLAIBORNE: It seems to us that when the 13 bank is merely the agent for the sale, with no 14 obligation to take up any portion of the issue which is 15 unsold, that its involvement with the commercial paper 16 is at its minimum, far less than when it's the purchaser 17 of the commercial paper and then has a real interest in 18 assuring that there isn't a default because it will be 19 the loser, whereas when it's the agent someone else will 20 be the loser and the reputation of the bank may be 21 marginally at stake, but at least it will not be its 22 depositors who are directly injured.

23 QUESTION: Well, Mr. Claiborne --

24 MR. CLAIBORNE: All this is -- excuse me.

25 QUESTION: No, you go ahead and finish with

1 Justice Powell.

2 MR. CLAIBORNE: But all this is supposing that 3 there is a serious risk in dealing in commercial paper,
4 and since the Penn Central failure there has been no
5 significant failure in commercial paper, and indeed 6 measures have been taken to assure that that is not so.
7 Commercial paper is the safest conceivable instrument in 8 which to deal, safer than an ordinary commercial loan.

9 QUESTION: Well, suppose it was not 10 non-recourse, or suppose that the bank did undertake 11 what underwriters frequently do, some obligation to buy 12 what wasn't sold. I would think your position would 13 still be that Glass-Steagall had nothing to do with 14 that; if the bank couldn't do that, it would be for some 15 other reason?

16 MR. CLAIBORNE: Since --

17 QUESTION: Am I right?

18 MR. CLAIBORNE: That is so. Since the bank
19 can and did and continues to be able to purchase it.

20 QUESTION: So you would say even that 21 Glass-Steagall would not prevent a bank from 22 underwriting and having an obligation to buy whatever 23 wasn't sold?

24 MR. CLAIBORNE: No, since it can clearly buy 25 directly, it can buy on condition, it can buy if no one

1 else buys. If it can buy straightforwardly, it can do
2 that. There's no reason -- the other dangers, the more
3 subtle hazards that were identified in the first ICI 4 decision, are not implicated here.

5 The bank's reputation for prudence and 6 soundness is enhanced, not at stake, when it deals in 7 commercial paper as opposed to investment securities.
8 The danger that the bank will have to or will be 9 inclined to shore up the companies whose commercial 10 paper it's dealing in because it's tied its fortunes or 11 its reputation to the fate of that enterprise is not 12 realistic here. Because of the absence of risk, there's 13 less occasion to think in terms of shoring up.

14 And in any event, because the rate on 15 commercial paper is lower than the rate on commercial 16 loans, there is no incentive to making -- to accepting a 17 loan in order to purchase commercial paper.

18 Now, the danger of giving disinterested advice 19 to customers of the bank, which is one of those 20 conflicts or potential conflicts that was identified in 21 the ICI decision, is not present here either. The 22 customers here are only a limited category of 23 sophisticated investors who are in a position to judge 24 for themselves and do not require the investment advice
25 of the bank. The general public and the general

1 customers of the bank are not potential buyers of 2 commercial paper.

3 The short of it is that there is no -- none of 4 the risks identified by this Court as underlying the 5 Glass-Steagall Act are implicated here, and indeed the 6 Petitioners cannot identify and have not attempted to 7 identify any such risks.

8 They say Congress determined there was a 9 risk. But after all, that is the whole issue in the 10 case, whether Congress did in fact encompass commercial 11 paper.

12 Now, finally --

13 CHIEF JUSTICE BURGER: We will resume there at 14 1:00 o'clock.

1 AFTERNOON SESSION

2 (1:00 p.m.)

3 CHIEF JUSTICE BURGER: Mr. Claiborne, you may 4 continue.

5 ORAL ARGUMENT OF LOUIS F. CLAIBORNE, ESQ.

6 ON BEHALF OF RESPONDENTS - RESUMED

7 MR. CLAIBORNE: Thank you, Mr. Chief Justice,
8 and may it please the Court:

9 I've only one short point remaining. It is 10 this: that commercial paper, because it is 11 indistinguishable from a short-term commercial loan, has 12 always been so treated by all three of the bank 13 regulators. And if I can draw the Court's attention to 14 the joint appendix, in which the Board's statement in 15 this case is reproduced at page 130. The paragraph 16 beginning at the bottom of that page, the Board says the 17 following:

18 "The present attitude of the bank regulatory 19 agencies is consistent with the view that commercial 20 paper is properly viewed as a loan, not as an investment 21 security. The instructions of each of the three federal 22 banking agencies for preparation of call reports direct 23 that commercial paper be treated as a loan. In 24 addition, the Federal Reserve's Manual of Examination
25 Procedures follows the same position."

1 That of course is relevant on a day to day
2 basis for each bank to determine whether the limits 3 applicable to loans or the limits applicable to 4 investment securities are applicable when it takes in 5 commercial paper into its inventory. From 1927 to this 6 day, the banking fraternity, with the approval and 7 indeed at the direction of the banking regulators, has 8 treated commercial paper in the category of loans, not 9 investment or security.

10 Now, this kind of decision as to which 11 category commercial paper falls in is precisely one as 12 to which there is properly owed deference to the bank 13 regulators. It is not, as is suggested on the other 14 side, that Congress made the Board or the Comptroller 15 regulators in the sense that they were given discretion 16 to waive in appropriate cases the prohibitions of the 17 Glass-Steagall Act.

18 Of course they have no such discretion. But 19 they do have a job to construe, to interpret the words 20 of the statute which they are required to enforce. And 21 it is in that sense that deference is due to their 22 special expertise.

23 QUESTION: Well, do you think, Mr. Claiborne, 24 that if the Board had construed it the other way, that 25 the banks couldn't do this, that they would have been

1 wrong?

2 MR. CLAIBORNE: In hindsight, yes, Your 3 Honor. But it doesn't --

4 QUESTION: Well, so that there's only one way
5 the statute can be read as far as you're concerned? So 6 it isn't a question of deference; it's just a question 7 of reading the statute.

8 MR. CLAIBORNE: Well, I can say on the one 9 hand that it seems the inevitable reading in light of 10 the plain language of the statute, the result which the 11 Board came to, but at the same time say that if I am 12 wrong in that respect and there are two reasonable 13 readings, so long as the Board made a reasonable 14 reading, deference ought to be accorded to that 15 reading.

16 QUESTION: But your statutory construction 17 argument it seems to me wouldn't leave any room for the 18 Board to go the other way.

19 MR. CLAIBORNE: I quite agree. But I may be 20 wrong --

21 QUESTION: Do you think that you -- do you 22 think that your position on the statute is consistent 23 with what the Board thinks the statute means?

24 MR. CLAIBORNE: I see no --

25 QUESTION: I thought the Board would have

1 thought it could go either way on this case.

2 MR. CLAIBORNE: The Board did not, as is 3 alleged, say that the statute literally read the other 4 way. The Board said the statute could by the untutored 5 eye be read to mean something different, but when we 6 read it in context, when we read it against the 7 legislative history, when we read Section 16 and Section 8 21 together, then we reach what the Board called the 9 stronger position.

10 QUESTION: But it still would have been 11 permissible in their view to go the other way, I 12 suppose?

13 MR. CLAIBORNE: It's difficult to construe
14 whether by "stronger" they meant -- they were simply 15 being cautious or whether they were being less 16 positive.

17 But in all events, we do urge that on the 18 matter of construction the Board, if there is a doubt 19 about it, is entitled to the deference in this 20 peculiarly complex area.

21 QUESTION: Mr. Claiborne, one other question,
22 and I hope it is in proper bounds. Has this position 23 had an impact on the enforcement of other laws, like the 24 securities laws? Has this construction by the Board, 25 has it had an impact, for example, on the Securities and

1 Exchange Commision and their regulation?

2 MR. CLAIBORNE: My impression is not so
3 because, with respect to the securities laws, it's 4 perfectly clear that, while commercial paper is a 5 covered security, it is exempted from the registration
6 requirement. And the Board has looked to the definition 7 of a peculiar kind of commercial paper in the securities 8 laws, so the two are meshed.

9 Let me say one final thing about the deference 10 due to the Board. I need only invoke what this Court 11 twice said, both in ICI I and in ICI II, about the 12 deference that is indeed due to the regulators, whether 13 the Comptroller or the Board, provided however, which is 14 what was lacking in ICI I, that that regulator not 15 merely announce a rule, but do so by articulating his 16 reasons for having got there in what is certainly 17 present here, a comprehensive and careful parsing of 18 legislative text, the legislative history, the policy as 19 identified by this Court which informed the passage of 20 the Act, and only then, after this careful articulation, 21 reach a conclusion.

22 In those circumstances, as the Court indicated 23 would be true when that was done, the Board ought be 24 entitled to this deference.

25 QUESTION: Mr. Claiborne, do you think it's

1 perfectly clear that Congress would have exempted banks
2 from the securities regulation field if they had thought 3 that all commercial paper was excluded from the 4 Glass-Steagall Act provisions?

5 MR. CLAIBORNE: I'm sorry, Justice O'Connor.
6 I must have missed the --

7 QUESTION: Well, it's your position, I take 8 it, that banks are not considered brokers and dealers
9 under the Securities Act, the Securities Exchange Act, 10 right? Is that correct?

11 MR. CLAIBORNE: That is correct.

12 QUESTION: Okay. Is it perfectly clear that 13 the banks would have been so treated if Congress had 14 understood that all commercial paper was outside the 15 scope of Glass-Steagall?

16 MR. CLAIBORNE: Well, I think that is probably 17 so, because Congress was aware that banks were dealing 18 in bankers acceptances, not yet in certificates of 19 deposit. But it seems to be accepted all around that 20 that dealing in certificates of deposit is not in any 21 way prohibited by the Glass-Steagall Act and 22 nevertheless the banks are not required to register as 23 dealers under the Securities Act.

24 And these relatively small-scale -- huge sums, 25 but the percentage of earnings for the banks out of 1 their dealings in commercial paper is a relatively small 2 quantity, an insignificant proportion of the banks'

3 earnings. The purpose of the banks is that it was a way 4 of selling their other services to those for whom they 5 perform this almost accommodation service.

6 CHIEF JUSTICE BURGER: Mr. Pitt, do you have 7 anything further?

8 REBUTTAL ARGUMENT OF HARVEY L. PITT, ESQ.

9 ON BEHALF OF PETITIONERS

10 MR. PITT: If I may. In response to the 11 questions both by Justice White and Justice O'Connor, I
12 would refer the Court to page 26, note 33, of the SIA's 13 opening brief, which indicates that both the Federal 14 Energy Regulatory Commission and the Securities Exchange 15 Commission had to take emergency action to obviate the 16 impact on both the federal energy laws and the SEC's
17 authority under the Public Utility Holding Company Act 18 because of the Board's unprecedented ruling involving 19 management interlocks and related issues.

20 Secondly, in response to Justice O'Connor's 21 question, the SEC has recently promulgated a proposed 22 rule which would undo the very statutory exemption to 23 which Justice O'Connor was referring. That is to say, 24 the federal securities laws presently exempt banks from 25 the definition of brokers and dealers. The SEC has said

1 that, in light of the activity of the banking agencies 2 -- and it's the decision in the court below which has 3 been the mainspring from which all of these decisions 4 have flowed -- it is necessary for that agency to 5 reconsider whether the exemptions given to banks from 6 these definitions are appropriate.

7 And so what we are faced with is a flurry of 8 administrative revisionism. This is hardly what 9 Congress could have intended --

10 QUESTION: Did the SEC let its views be known 11 before the Board?

12 MR. PITT: The SEC did make its views known 13 before the Board and it vehemently disagreed.

14 QUESTION: Are those views in the record?

15 MR. PITT: They are, Your Honor. All letters 16 written by the SEC, first from its general counsel and 17 then reaffirmed by the Commission, are in the record.

18 QUESTION: And did they take a position in the 19 Court of Appeals? Were they allowed to?

20 MR. PITT: They took a position in the 21 district court, and in the Court of Appeals they did not 22 take a position.

23 QUESTION: Well, they probably didn't have --

24 MR. PITT: But their brief is in the record
25 before the Court.

1 Finally, just one additional point. I think
2 it's important to note that the briefs of the parties do
3 discuss the hazards presented, and I think the questions 4 earlier this morning indicated that it is precisely the 5 function of a bank being both a lender to a corporation 6 and a promoter and marketer of its corporate paper, 7 commercial paper notes, are exactly the conflicts 8 Glass-Steagall was designed to prohibit. And both of 9 the briefs on the Petitioners' side are replete with 10 instances of the precise hazards that are involved.

11 Beyond that, I think it's important to state 12 --

13 QUESTION: Well, banks, though, are certainly 14 regularly going around hunting participants in loans 15 that are beyond their limits.

16 MR. PITT: I would say banks syndicate loans 17 regularly and always have.

18 QUESTION: So this is just a loan in which the 19 originating bank doesn't have a part.

20 MR. PITT: No, I disagree, Your Honor. This 21 is --

22 QUESTION: Well, I know you disagree.

23 MR. PITT: This is a marketing activity. This 24 is a marketing activity. Bankers Trust isn't lending 25 anyone any money. What it is doing is it's placing its

1 reputation and the resources of the bank behind an 2 investment banking effort, and that's what 3 Glass-Steagall was designed to prevent.

4 CHIEF JUSTICE BURGER: Thank you, gentlemen.
5 The case is submitted.

6 We'll hear arguments next in --

7 QUESTION: Mr. Chief Justice, may I just ask 8 one question?

9 CHIEF JUSTICE BURGER: Excuse me.

10 QUESTION: Would you comment on Mr.
11 Claiborne's observation as to the position taken by the 12 three regulatory bank agencies over the years?

13 MR. PITT: Yes, Your Honor, and I'm pleased 14 you asked me that, because I did want to comment that 15 the positions taken were with respect to commercial 16 paper as a purchase and as a loan. There has never been 17 a position taken prior to the ones that are at issue in 18 this case that banks could underwrite commercial paper.

19 And I might add that Mr. Claiborne's prior 20 references to the Congressional history demonstrate that 21 Congress intended for banks to purchase commercial 22 paper, and there is clear authority for that, but not to 23 underwrite it, and that's the essence of this case.

24 (Whereupon, at 1:13 p.m., argument in the 25 above-entitled matter was submitted.)
