2 CHIEF JUSTICE BURGER: We'll hear arguments
3 first this morning in United States against Yermian.

4 Ms. Corwin, you may proceed whenever you're 5 ready.

6 ORAL ARGUMENT OF CAROLYN CORWIN, ESQ.,

7 ON BEHALF OF PETITIONER

8 MS. CORWIN: Thank you, Mr. Chief Justice, and 9 may it please the Court:

10 This case raises the question of what elements
11 the government must prove in order to establish a 12 violation of 18 U.S.C. 1001, the federal false 13 statements statute.

14 Respondent in this case filled out a form in 15 connection with a security clearance process required by 16 the Department of Defense. Respondent had been hired as 17 an engineer by a company that was a defense contractor.
18 In order to work on certain projects, it was necessary
19 that he be investigated and that he receive a government
20 security clearance.

21 For that purpose, Respondent's employer gave 22 him a work sheet to fill out. On that work sheet, 23 Respondent indicated that he had never been convicted of 24 a crime and he listed the employers for whom he had 25 worked in the past. Respondent's employer transcribed

1 that information onto another form entitled "Department
2 of Defense personnel security questionnaire."
3 Respondent signed that form and it was mailed to the 4 Department of Defense.

5 Subsequently, the FBI discovered that in fact 6 Respondent had been convicted of mail fraud and that two 7 of the employers that he had listed on his form in fact 8 had never employed Respondent. On the basis of those 9 false statements, Respondent was indicted and convicted
10 for violations of Section 1001. At trial Respondent's 11 sole defense was that he had not realized that the false 12 information he provided would be forwarded to the 13 federal government.

14 Both sides in this case agree that the 15 government must establish certain elements in order to 16 make out a violation of Section 1001. The government
17 must prove that the defendant's statements were false
18 and that he knew it at the time. Respondent 19 acknowledges here that his statements were false and 20 that he knew that when he filled out and signed the 21 form.

22 Both sides also agree that the government must 23 establish that a defendant made his statement in a 24 matter within federal agency jurisdiction. Respondent 25 agrees with us that his false statements were made in

1 such a matter, since the government security clearance
2 process is a matter within the jurisdiction of the 3 Department of Defense.

4 QUESTION: May I ask right there, what about 5 the work sheet? Was that a matter within the 6 jurisdiction?

7 MS. CORWIN: Well, I think the matter within 8 the jurisdiction was the entire security clearance 9 process.

10 QUESTION: So the work sheet would be part of 11 it?

12 MS. CORWIN: The work sheet was part of that 13 process, and it was really a preparation for the final 14 sheet that was typed up and sent in.

15 QUESTION: So you could have indicted him on 16 the basis of the work sheet?

17 MS. CORWIN: Well, I think that depends on 18 whether the security clearance process worked its way
19 through. I suppose if the work sheet had been filled 20 out and it had been decided never to proceed with the 21 process that it wouldn't have been in a matter.

22 QUESTION: Well, suppose the employer had just 23 forwarded the work sheet without having the supplemental 24 document which had on its face the evidence about the 25 security clearance?

1 MS. CORWIN: Well, I would note preliminarily
2 that the work sheet did have some indications that
3 it --

4 QUESTION: Well, suppose it had none.

5 MS. CORWIN: -- was a government document on 6 it.

7 QUESTION: Suppose it had none, to get my 8 hypothetical.

9 MS. CORWIN: Well, if it hadn't had anything
10 on it, I think it would -- and it were forwarded, I
11 think it would depend on whether the information 12 initially had been requested in connection with the 13 government security clearance.

14 QUESTION: Supposing it was. That's precisely 15 the information the government wanted, and they just 16 didn't disclose to the employee that they were making a
17 security clearance.

18 MS. CORWIN: Well, I think if the employer had 19 requested the information and requested that the work 20 sheet be filled out for the purpose of forwarding it to 21 the Department of Defense, it would be --

22 QUESTION: Without telling the employee?

23 MS. CORWIN: That's correct. It would be in a 24 matter within federal jurisdiction, regardless of what 25 was said.

1 QUESTION: So that the employee could be 2 liable under the statute without having any knowledge of 3 federal involvement?

4 MS. CORWIN: Yes, that is our position, that 5 Congress did not intend that the government prove 6 knowledge of federal involvement in a case like this.
7 That is precisely the point on which the parties 8 disagree in this case, whether the government must prove 9 that the defendant knew that there was federal 10 involvement when he makes a false statement.

11 Three Court of Appeals, the Fifth, the Sixth, 12 and the Seventh Circuits, have held that such proof is 13 not an element of a Section 1001 offense. The Ninth 14 Circuit here held that the government is required to 15 prove knowledge of federal involvement.

16 Now, this question is similar to one that many 17 federal courts have confronted in the context of a 18 number of different federal statutes. This Court
19 considered just a question in United States versus 20 Feola. That case involved a federal statute and the 21 question raised was whether it was necessary for the 22 government to prove that an assailant knew that his 23 victim was a federal officer in order to make out a 24 violation of the federal assault statute.

25 The Court analyzed Congress' purposes in

1 enacting the statute and it considered whether the 2 element of knowledge was necessary as a matter of 3 fairness, in order to prevent unfairness, and on the 4 basis of that analysis it concluded that Congress in 5 enacting the federal assault statute had intended -- had 6 not intended to require the government to prove 7 knowledge of federal involvement on top of all the other 8 elements it was required to prove.

9 We suggest that in this case the Feola
10 analysis and conclusions apply a fortiori in the case of 11 Section 1001. We begin with the language, and here I 12 think we have a stronger case than the Court was 13 confronted with in Feola. There the federal assault 14 statute on its face simply didn't say anything about the 15 required intent.

16 Here we have a statute that talks about 17 knowingly and willfully making a false statement, so we 18 have words of intent. But I think it's quite clear from 19 the face of the statute that those words apply to the 20 making of a false statement and not to the separate 21 phrase, "in any matter within federal agency
22 jurisdiction."

23 QUESTION: Ms. Corwin, does the government
24 agree that the shifting of the language in the 1948
25 revision was not intended to achieve any substantive

1 result?

2 MS. CORWIN: Yes, and indeed this Court has 3 suggested it wasn't intended. In Bramblett the Court
4 signified that it had not intended a substantive 5 change.

6 QUESTION: Before '48 the language wasn't 7 quite as favorable to this particular part of your 8 argument as it is now.

9 MS. CORWIN: Well, I'm not sure that that is 10 quite so, although I would not preliminarily that we 11 ought to give some credit to the fact that in 1948
12 Congress thought it was clarifying an ambiguity; and to 13 the extent that it was attempting to do that I think we 14 ought to read today's statute rather than the older 15 one.

16 But even if the language had never been 17 shifted, I don't think that changes the fact that that 18 "in any matter" phrase has always been somewhat set
19 apart from the rest of the statute and has been phrased
20 in terms that don't sound at all in any sort of intent 21 or purpose.

22 I think that's significant on the face of the 23 statute, whether you look at the old statute or the 24 recodified version, and I think it's even more 25 significant when you look at the language that had

1 existed prior to the amendment in 1934. There you had a
2 phrase that, in addition to the knowingly and willfully
3 language, said: "Whoever, with the purpose or the 4 intent of cheating or swindling or defrauding the United 5 States, knowingly and willfully makes a false
6 statement". In 1934 Congress replaced that language 7 with this "in any matter within federal agency 8 jurisdiction" phrase, a phrase that doesn't sound at all 9 in any sort of intent or purpose.

10 Now, the Court in Feola looked primarily to 11 the legislative purpose and the legislative history to 12 determine whether Congress would have intended that 13 knowledge of federal involvement be an element of the 14 crime. Under Section 1001, these factors appear to 15 point at least as clearly as in Feola to the conclusion
16 that knowledge of federal involvement is not something 17 that Congress would have required the government to 18 prove.

19 This Court has construed Section 1001 on 20 several occasions -- in the Gilliland case, in the 21 Bramblett case, and in the Bryson case -- and on each
22 occasion the Court has noted the breadth of the statute 23 and the Congressional purpose to afford protection to 24 all sorts of federal functions. The Court has concluded
25 that it's inappropriate to read the statute

1 restrictively in light of that very broad Congressional 2 purpose in amending the statute in 1934.

3 Now, the interest in protecting federal 4 functions is one that exists regardless of the 5 individual's knowledge of whether he is involved in a 6 government matter. In this case, Respondent's false 7 statement concerning his prior conviction and his prior 8 employers had just as much potential to interfere with 9 federal functions, whether or not he knew about whether 10 there was this government security clearance process 11 going on.

12 QUESTION: Do we have any cases in which a 13 defendant has been held criminally liable without having 14 any knowledge that what he was doing might be a crime?
15 I'm thinking of a case, Mike Royko had a column in the 16 Chicago Tribune about lying to people when they come out 17 in the exit polls.

18 Supposing an FBI agent were investigating
19 election frauds and didn't tell the people he questioned 20 coming out of the polls that he was doing that, and 21 somebody lied to him. Under your view it would violate 22 the statute?

23 MS. CORWIN: I think that something such as 24 the hypothetical you're suggesting may well not violate 25 the statute, although I don't want to take a position on

1 that particular Mike Royko incident. But I think it's 2 important to recall that the government has to prove a 3 number of things in order to make out a violation of 4 Section 1001 quite apart from the issue we have here.

5 One of those things it has to prove is that a 6 statement was made willfully. I think that in such a 7 case as you posit --

8 QUESTION: It's a deliberate lie, I'm 9 assuming, a deliberate misstatement of how a person 10 voted. Or maybe an FBI agent comes up to somebody at 11 the bar without telling him he's an FBI agent, he 12 engages him in a conversation, the man lies to him.

13 MS. CORWIN: Well, I would suggest that the 14 element of willfulness which is on the face of the 15 statute requires some sort of conscious wrongdoing, and 16 I think the individual who engages in the sort of 17 private conversation or perhaps a conversation in which 18 he doesn't expect that anyone is going to rely in any 19 meaningful way on what he says --

20 QUESTION: But the real question, does it
21 require knowledge of anything other than willful 22 falsity?

23 MS. CORWIN: Well, I think not. I mean, in 24 order to make out the violation you have to know that 25 you've made a false statement.

1 QUESTION: Right.

2 MS. CORWIN: And you also -- the government
3 also must prove it's in a matter within federal agency 4 jurisdiction, as well as being in many cases material to 5 the functions of the government.

6 QUESTION: Correct.

7 MS. CORWIN: And I suggest that maybe some of 8 those elements are going to exclude the sort of 9 hypotheticals that you've suggested, and particularly 10 the sort of hypotheticals that Respondent has posed.

11 QUESTION: Well, I assume FBI agents
12 frequently interrogate people without disclosing their 13 identity, and they're engaged in very important federal 14 work.

15 MS. CORWIN: Well, that's indeed true, and I
16 suggest that perhaps in a different setting, if the FBI
17 agent were working undercover in a business perhaps, you
18 might have a situation in which you would have something 19 you could call willful conduct, something that would 20 very likely violate the state criminal statute of, say, 21 false pretenses, and there you might have coverage
22 because the conduct was willful.

23 But I don't think, for example in the 24 hypotheticals that Respondent has put forward, which are 25 quite far from his own case --

1 QUESTION: I agree with those hypotheticals,
2 with your view on those hypotheticals. But if the 3 neighbor were actually an FBI agent in each of those 4 cases, then you'd be committing a crime without having 5 any knowledge that you were engaged in criminal 6 activity.

7 MS. CORWIN: Well, I'm just not sure that's 8 true. If I were a federal prosecutor who knew I had to 9 make out the elements of knowing falsity and 10 willfulness, I think I would hesitate before I would 11 indict somebody like that.

12 QUESTION: Well, what is willfulness other
13 than knowing falsity? That's the only willfulness 14 requirement I understand you to contend there is.

15 MS. CORWIN: Well, of course, the statute says
16 "knowingly and willfully," and I think that the element
17 of conscious wrongdoing is something that may well 18 exclude this private casual conversation between 19 neighbors, in which you never anticipate that anyone's 20 going to --

21 QUESTION: How about an application for 22 employment form without knowing -- assume the government
23 required all employment application forms to be screened 24 for security purposes at some defense plant or 25 something, without telling the people. Would every

1 person who filled out, made a false statement on an 2 application form be committing a crime? I think he 3 would.

4 MS. CORWIN: I think that if one could prove 5 all the other elements of the statute that, yes, that 6 would be a crime. But I would point out that you have a 7 situation that is not that different from what you had 8 in Feola, in that you have federal functions that are 9 significant that you're protecting by this coverage of 10 the statute.

11 QUESTION: But Ms. Corwin, doesn't everyone
12 know that assaulting someone is going to be a criminal 13 offense? And I suppose not everyone knows that lying 14 about his age, for instance, might be a federal 15 offense.

16 MS. CORWIN: Well, that may be, but I think 17 that in many cases people who make false statements, 18 particularly in a context such as that of Respondent, 19 they are certainly going to know that their conduct is 20 wrongful. And I suppose it depends on the context, when 21 you suggest the lying about age; and I remind you again 22 that there are things the government has to prove in 23 terms of, for example, materiality, and it may be that a 24 statement like that wouldn't be material.

25 But I think that a false statement,

1 particularly in the sort of context you have here, in 2 the employment context, is not only going to be 3 something someone knows is wrongful, but is either going 4 to come quite close or arguably falls within the state 5 false pretenses statute, in which you may intend to 6 deceive your employer, and that is something that falls 7 within the state criminal statute.

8 I think when you consider the sort of broad 9 purposes, the protection of federal functions, that 10 Congress had in mind when it enacted the statute in 11 1934, you are -- it's very difficult to conceive that 12 Congress would have intended to somehow carve out the 13 particular sort of conduct in which Respondent acts in 14 this case.

15 And I think it's unlikely that Congress would 16 have intended to impose, in addition to all the other 17 elements that the government has to prove, that 18 additional burden of proving that an individual actually 19 knew that he was acting in a matter within federal 20 agency jurisdiction.

21 QUESTION: Well, Ms. Corwin, in this 22 particular case I suppose that the evidence available 23 here, the document in question which was signed by the 24 Respondent here, is evidence of knowledge, and so if 25 knowledge is required presumably the government could go

1 to trial with the same proof it had.

2 We're here because of an instruction, are we 3 not, where the court said having reason to know was 4 enough? But there was actually evidence that I would 5 assume would take you to the jury on actual knowledge, 6 isn't there?

7 MS. CORWIN: Well, I think that's right, and 8 it is certainly conceivable that on a remand that we 9 would prevail in this case on the basis of that sort of 10 evidence. I don't know that that's necessarily going to 11 be the case every time this comes up, and I think it may 12 well be that -- I mean, Respondent here believes, at 13 least has some idea, that he can prevail on this sort of 14 standard, and I think it is not certain that the 15 government is going to prevail in every case like 16 Respondent's with the sort of simply evidence of 17 knowledge that's circumstantial that you suggest.

18 Now, I think in terms of the legislative 19 history in 1934, Respondent has tried to suggest that 20 Congress was trying to accomplish something very 21 narrow. I think that that simply is not so when you 22 look at the face of the legislative history.

23 As I referred to when I spoke to Justice
24 Rehnquist's question, the substitution of the phrase -- 25 the old phrase, "with the intent or purpose of

1 defrauding the United States," was replaced by this new
2 phrase, "in any matter within federal agency
3 jurisdiction." I think that's the key point that 4 happened in 1934.

5 But when you look at some of the other
6 material in the legislative history, I don't think it
7 supports Respondent's construction of the statute.
8 There was no mention of attempting to correct the U.S.
9 versus Cohn case. That's surely something that Congress
10 had in mind, but I think they were aiming at a somewhat 11 broader problem.

12 They had some difficulties that had arisen in 13 some of these federal programs. They were confronted 14 with false statements that were causing things like the 15 hot oil program and the public works program to break 16 down, and they were attempting to find a comprehensive 17 solution that would apply to a number of federal 18 agencies and a range of federal functions.

19 Now, the Court in Fecla also turned to the 20 question of whether it was unfair to convict an 21 individual without that element of knowledge of federal 22 involvement, and that's a relevant question, I suppose, 23 because it tells us something about what Congress must 24 have had in mind when it acted at the time here in 1934, 25 and indeed, I read Respondent to be centering his

1 argument on this point.

2 But I think as I noted in answering Justice
3 O'Connor's question, I think it is frequently that one 4 is going to have conduct that meets all the elements of 5 Section 1001, even without knowledge, that conduct is 6 going to be wrongful.

7 Now, Respondent here acknowledges that his 8 conduct was wrongful. He says no question about that,
9 he intended to deceive his employer. He just didn't 10 know that he was also deceiving the United States. And 11 he poses some hypotheticals that involve, as I've 12 suggested to Justice Stevens, a casual private 13 conversation.

14 Those would not be covered under Section 15 1001. The government would not have been able to prove 16 that they were in a matter within federal agency 17 jurisdiction, in all probability, and would not have 18 been able to prove they were willful.

19 I suggest that frequently conduct that falls 20 within Section 1001 is going to be either within or 21 close to the line of a state criminal statute and is 22 clearly going to be the sort of conscious wrongdoing
23 that we really don't hesitate to impose criminal 24 penalties on.

25 QUESTION: Well, there's another example you

1 suggested on page 30 of your brief, on the information
2 gathering function in connection with the NRA in the hot 3 oil cases, where you mention that people might send 4 information in to the central information gatherer, who 5 in turn would forward it to the government, and they 6 would not know it was going to be used for a government 7 purpose.

8 Isn't it entirely possible in those situations 9 that members of the trade associations, not wanting to 10 be entirely candid to their competitors, might misstate 11 facts, which could constitute a violation without any 12 knowledge that they were running that risk?

13 MS. CORWIN: Well, I'm not sure that's 14 precisely right in the hot oil context. What people 15 were doing in the hot oil context was certifying that 16 they had not exceeded state law production limits, and 17 that is the sort of information --

18 QUESTION: Well, in that particular case
19 that's right. But as you point out in your brief, there 20 are situations where false statements to such private 21 groups can be made without realizing the ultimate 22 purpose. And trade associations, of course, are a 23 classic example.

24 MS. CORWIN: Well, I think that's right, but I
25 think Congress had in mind that sort of interference

1 with federal functions.

2 QUESTION: Even though the businessman had no
3 knowledge that there would be any federal use of the 4 information?

5 MS. CORWIN: Well, I think that's correct. I
6 think you could have a situation, as you suggested, like 7 the one Respondent is involved in here, in which someone 8 within the petroleum, the oil company, passes on 9 information to someone else, who then forwards it to the 10 federal government.

11 Maybe the defense is: Well, all I was 12 certifying was there was no excess over the state quota,
13 so I thought I was deceiving the state government, or I 14 thought I was deceiving my employer. But you still have 15 the same sort of harm to the hot oil program.

16 I would just mention in passing that another 17 regulation under that program in 1933 was actually 18 affidavits going between private parties.

19 QUESTION: Oh, I agree with you in that 20 particular program that people should have been aware 21 they were violating some state rules, if not the federal 22 rule. But what I'm suggesting to you is that there are 23 information gathering programs where you use trade 24 associations to gather the information, and the 25 individual supplier of the information may not have any

1 knowledge that the federal government might use it and 2 might intend to deceive his competitors, because he's 3 not living up to some price-fixing agreement or 4 something of that kind. He'd be a criminal.

5 MS. CORWIN: Well, I suppose that's possible.
6 I'm not sure that that's necessarily not wrongful 7 conduct, although if you could prove that somehow the 8 motive was a justifiable one, was one that just doesn't 9 fall within that willful conduct category, that you
10 still may not get all the way under your Section 1001, 11 your other elements you have to prove.

12 I think you just have to keep in mind that the 13 federal government has to prove a lot of things under 14 this statute, and the question is whether Congress 15 intended to impose this additional burden in a case like 16 the one we have before us.

17 QUESTION: Well, they have to prove two 18 things: federal involvement and knowledge of falsity.
19 Those are the two elements.

20 MS. CORWIN: Well, many courts have -- well, 21 the willfulness is separate. I think that there is an 22 element of willfulness that is not necessarily 23 encompassed within a knowingly false statement.

24 Many courts have also read the concept of 25 materiality into the statute, and I think there you wipe

1 out a lot of these sort of trivial examples in which 2 somebody just, you know, says something very minor, 3 they're a day off on their age or something like that.

4 I think that, as in Feola, you simply do not 5 have the sort of unfairness or any other reason to 6 depart from what appears to be the clear import of the 7 statutory language and the broad legislative purpose and 8 the legislative history from 1934. There is simply no
9 reason to assume that Congress meant to carve out a 10 special category that would cover Respondent's conduct 11 in its protection of federal functions or to impose the 12 additional burden of proof that Respondent urges here.

13 I'd like to reserve the remainder of my time
14 if there are no further questions.

15 CHIEF JUSTICE BURGER: Mr. Hillman.

16 ORAL ARGUMENT OF STEPHEN J. HILLMAN, ESQ.

17 ON BEHALF OF RESPONDENT

18 MR. HILLMAN: Mr. Chief Justice and may it
19 please the Court:

20 I'd like to first address myself to two points
21 that Justice Stevens raised. I also thought of the Mike
22 Royko example as I was on the plane to Washington, and I 23 think that if a federal elections official, perhaps, who 24 was present in Chicago ensuring the integrity of a local 25 election approached a person who was exiting the polls

1 and did not make his identity known to that person, and 2 that person lied about who he voted for, I believe that 3 under the government's interpretation that person could 4 be charged under 1001.

5 QUESTION: Well, isn't there an answer to 6 that, that it's none of the government's business how a 7 person votes, and it washes out all of Mr. Royko's 8 concerns? How could it conceivably be any of the 9 government's business under any circumstances how a 10 person voted?

11 MR. HILLMAN: I think that such a question
12 could arise during the questioning by a federal election 13 official who was there to ensure the integrity of the 14 voting process. He might ask the person some other 15 question that would not --

16 QUESTION: What would that do to our 17 traditional secrecy of the ballot?

18 MR. HILLMAN: Well, supposing the federal 19 official was acting improperly. It is a far-fetched
20 example, but I did want to address Justice Stevens' 21 concerns.

22 I think that Justice Stevens also raised a 23 better hypothetical --

24 QUESTION: Wouldn't the defendant be protected 25 in your example by the requirement of materiality?

1 MR. HILLMAN: The requirement of materiality
2 may not be enough. I think that there has to also be, 3 there has to be a knowledge requirement, there has to be 4 intending to do something that the law forbids. There 5 has to be something willfully done.

6 Justice Stevens raised a hypothetical that 7 really places -- is really better than our hypothetical,
8 and that is where the neighbor is an FBI agent and not 9 just a private party. A neighbor who is an FBI agent, 10 who may be, his actual job may be to inquire into a
11 matter of federal jurisdiction to the person we call X
12 in our brief, might be unknown to the neighbor. And I
13 think that under the government's interpretation 1001
14 could apply to that as well.

15 Justice O'Connor correctly stated that one of 16 the main reasons we're here is because of an incorrect
17 jury instruction. The instruction actually did not say 18 that the Defendant should have -- would have reason to 19 know or that the jury would have to find reason to 20 know.

21 But the jury instruction actually said that 22 the Defendant knew or should have known that the 23 information was to be submitted to a government agency.
24 And we believe that that instruction is entirely 25 inappropriate and ambiguous, because it would allow the

1 jury to convict believing that the person should have 2 morally known that his statement was going to --

3 QUESTION: Mr. Hillman, the government's cert
4 petition does not raise a question about the form of the 5 instruction as I read it. The only question is whether 6 there's any need for federal involvement, as I read the 7 -- the only question presented by the cert petition.

8 MR. HILLMAN: The government does argue, Your 9 Honor, that even if our position is correct, that the 10 jury instruction cured any error, and we believe that 11 that is incorrect because it was an ambiguously
12 worded --

13 QUESTION: Yes, but they didn't preserve that 14 question, is all I'm saying.

15 MR. HILLMAN: All right.

16 QUESTION: And they're seeking reversal.

17 QUESTION: The history of the statute is 18 convoluted, but there is a clear thread woven into the 19 statute from its original antecedent through the 1948
20 recodification, and that thread is the requirement that 21 a person know of federal involvement.

22 Since the 1948 amendment itself was 23 non-substantive, as the Court has recognized, it is 24 necessary to focus on the 1934 legislative process and 25 intent of Congress in 1934. Significantly, the first

1 bill that was submitted to Congress in 1934 contained 2 language of specific intent to defraud the government.
3 That first bill, of course, was vetoed, but it was 4 vetoed because it failed to reach further than the 5 existing 1918 statute and to reach the concerns
6 expressed by the Court in United States versus Cohn.
7 Contrary to the government's position, the first bill 8 was not vetoed because it contained language of specific 9 intent to defraud.

10 In the second bill, the one that was finally 11 enacted, the "in any matter" language first appears.
12 The government well understands that the vetoed bill 13 required the specific intent to defraud, but 14 nevertheless the government argues that the new 15 language, the "in any matter" language, was intended to 16 be in essence a radical and substantive broadening from 17 the first bill, and indeed from the entire statutory 18 history all the way back to 1863.

19 It is our position that there is nothing in 20 the veto language, nor in the remarks of Congress, nor 21 in the experience of Congress as of 1934 that would have 22 led Congress to abandon the long-standing knowledge 23 requirement. On the contrary, it appears from the 24 sparse legislative history that Congress finally 25 recognized the problem created in the Cohn type

1 situation and the problem inherent in the 1918 statute
2 and that Congress therefore inserted the new phrase to 3 encompass non-monetary deceptions of newly created 4 federal programs.

5 It's interesting to note, I think, that in 6 1948 what had been Section 35 of the Criminal Code was 7 brought within the penumbra of the 1000 section of Title
8 18, and it was in 1948 that Section 35 became Section 9 1001. And in doing so, Congress incorporated our 10 statute into the broader statutory scheme which was 11 contained in 1001 through 1016.

12 I think it's noteworthy that in this broad 13 scheme all of the other false statement statutes either 14 on their face require a specific intent to defraud, such 15 as 1005, which prohibits false entries in bank books 16 with the intent to defraud -- that is the specific 17 language -- or in 1004 or 1011, the status, the very 18 status or position of the covered personnel, such as a 19 bank officer or a mortgagee, gives adequate notice to 20 the person that he is dealing with the government.

21 If the government's interpretation of 1001 is 22 accepted, it would appear that there would be no need 23 for these specific statutes, because the government
24 could always resort to Section 1001 and thereby 25 circumvent the specific statutes which either require

1 specific intent on their face or give notice to the 2 defendant by his very status that he is dealing with the 3 government.

4 The government goes on to argue that the 5 social and political context of the new deal, the 6 background as they call it, indicate that Congress must 7 have intended to delete the long-standing requirement of 8 jurisdictional knowledge from the 1934 statute.

9 First of all, there is no record of such 10 concerns in the legislative history. There is no
11 mention whatsoever of this concern in President 12 Roosevelt's veto language.

13 And I would contend that if those had been the 14 concerns of Congress they would have been -- they would 15 have shown up in the first bill. That is, if these had 16 been the concerns of Congress, the first bill would not 17 have contained the specific language that it did, the 18 language of intent to defraud.

19 Although Congress concededly was concerned 20 about the integrity of all federal programs and the 21 newly created federal programs, Congress in our view had 22 no reason to address a person such as that of Respondent
23 who had no knowledge of federal jurisdiction. I think 24 what shows that is that the vast majority of the 25 intermediary cases, statements made to an intermediary

1 where there is knowledge of the federal destination of 2 the statement, the vast majority of those cases cited in 3 both briefs arose in the 1960's and '70's, as the 4 government delegated more responsibility to the states
5 and to private industry. There simply is no indication 6 that Congress was even aware of such a problem in 1934.

7 Turning to the Feola case, we contend that 8 Section 1001 is fundamentally different from Section 9 1011, the federal assault statute. If the government is 10 correct, then 1001 could be used to punish persons who 11 make private statements, statement which, unlike 12 assault, no state law may proscribe, which are not 13 fraudulent -- and which are not fraudulent by any 14 stretch of the imagination.

15 The government does not acknowledge that there
16 are situations where the making of a private false 17 statement and federal agency jurisdiction are 18 contemporaneous.

19 QUESTION: Could I -- could you tell me where 20 you made the -- you requested the instruction that you
21 think should have been given in this case?

22 MR. HILLMAN: Yes, Your Honor.

23 QUESTION: Is it in the joint appendix?

24 MR. HILLMAN: Yes, it is, on page 49.

25 QUESTION: 39?

1 MR. HILLMAN: 49, Your Honor.

2 QUESTION: 49.

3 And you think it's enough, you think it's 4 enough for the government to prove that the statement is 5 made in connection with something that has a federal 6 involvement?

7 MR. HILLMAN: Knowledge of federal
8 involvement.

9 QUESTION: What does that mean?

10 MR. HILLMAN: Knowledge that the statement is 11 within federal jurisdiction, that it is destined for a 12 federal agency, that there is some material legitimate 13 concern on behalf of a federal agency.

14 QUESTION: So do you agree that if you have a 15 knock on your door at home and the gentleman there 16 identifies himself as an FBI agent, saying he's 17 investigating a murder in the neighborhood or something 18 -- does it violate 1001 for you to lie to him?

19 MR. HILLMAN: Of course. Of course, because 20 he would have knowledge face to face that he was dealing 21 with a federal agency.

22 QUESTION: That's all you really need as far 23 as you're concerned, is just some knowledge that that 24 statement is relevant to some official business of the 25 government?

1 MR. HILLMAN: Yes, Your Honor. In fact, we 2 don't need any --

3 QUESTION: Mr. Hillman, you don't want to 4 concede any other people's cases, do you?

5 (Laughter.)

6 MR. HILLMAN: No, sir.

7 QUESTION: But you don't -- didn't you request 8 an instruction that the government had to prove an 9 intent to defraud the government?

10 MR. HILLMAN: I'm sorry?

11 QUESTION: Didn't you request an instruction 12 that --

13 MR. HILLMAN: No. We only requested the 14 instruction on page 49 of the joint appendix, Your 15 Honor.

16 Your Honor's hypothetical of the FBI agent
17 coming to the door is certainly an appropriate one. We 18 would concede that you certainly don't need face to 19 face, you don't have to have a face to face transaction 20 in order to come within the ambit of 1001. All of the 21 intermediary cases are dealing with people who are 22 making statements solely to state agencies or private 23 employers, but they have, from the facts it is clear 24 that they have, knowledge of the final destination of 25 the statement.

1 I believe that the experience of the lower 2 courts tells us that when a defense of no knowlede is 3 raised, that the facts will usually overwhelmingly rebut
4 a defendant's claim of no knowledge if it is a sham. I 5 would ask the Court to compare the operation and the 6 usefulness of perhaps the mail fraud statute, Section 7 1341. The usefulness of that statute to the government 8 is certainly not impaired, even though this Court has 9 held that the defendant must know that the use of the 10 mails is reasonably foreseeable. A defense of lack of 11 reasonable foreseeability of the use of the mails in my 12 experience is rarely raised, and even far less to be 13 successful. And I certainly do not hear the government 14 complaining that the requirement of reasonable 15 foreseeability of the use of the mails cbstructs the 16 usefulness of the statute.

17 Similarly, I think we could look at Title 21, 18 the statutes which prohibit knowing importation of 19 narcotics. The standard there is, of course, that the 20 person must know that he is importing contraband. He 21 need not know the specific narcotic that he is carrying,
22 but he must know that he is carrying a controlled 23 substance.

24 Day after day we have people entering this 25 country with narcotics --

1 QUESTION: Well, this man knew he was lying,
2 didn't he?

3 MR. HILLMAN: Yes, he did.

4 QUESTION: Well, I don't know what this 5 argument's going to help him.

6 MR. HILLMAN: I'm sorry, Your Honor?

7 QUESTION: I don't see how this argument helps 8 that point.

9 MR. HILLMAN: My point, Your Honor, is 10 simply --

11 QUESTION: I thought it's admitted he 12 deliberately lied and meant to do it.

13 MR. HILLMAN: Yes, and he was subject to 14 state --

15 QUESTION: Is that not the case?

16 MR. HILLMAN: He was subject to state
17 penalties. But I believe that, with the drug 18 importation analogy, the government is not heard to 19 complain that they are put to proof by proving knowledge 20 that the person was importing a controlled substance.

21 The government does justifiably raise some 22 concerns that our interpretation could lead to a serious 23 situation, such as perhaps a knowingly defective part 24 being placed in a nuclear reactor without someone 25 knowing that it was going to be within a matter of 1 federal jurisdiction.

2 That is an appropriate concern. I believe,
3 however, that such an action is inherently dangerous and 4 gives notice to the wrongdoer of the danger, and I think 5 that the action could be proscribed under the reasoning
6 of this Court in United States versus Freed.

7 For situations which are not inherently
8 dangerous, Congress could if it chose draft a statute
9 which prohibited the submissions of false statements 10 which affect a federal agency, and could if it chose 11 eliminate a jurisdictional knowledge requirement.

12 For the very small class of persons whose 13 actions are not fraudulent, we contend that our 14 interpretation is a justifiable and necessary 15 protection.

16 If there are no other questions, thank you.

17 CHIEF JUSTICE BURGER: Very well.

18 Do you have anything further, Ms. Corwin?

19 REBUTTAL ARGUMENT OF CAROLYN CORWIN, ESQ.,

20 ON BEHALF OF PETITIONER

21 MS. CORWIN: Just a brief response. Thank 22 you, Mr. Chief Justice.

23 I want to point out again that in this case we 24 have a Respondent who acknowledges that his conduct was 25 fraudulent. Some of the rather marginal examples that

1 have been discussed up here, I just want to remind the 2 Court that I think it is quite unlikely that you're 3 going to find those either being prosecuted or being 4 prosecutable, because there is this requirement of 5 willfulness.

6 This is a separate requirement from the 7 knowledge requirement under Section 1001, and I think it 8 involves someone's sense of whether someone else is 9 going to rely to their detriment on the statements he is 10 making. I think that --

11 QUESTION: Well, ordinarily that isn't the 12 case, Ms. Corwin. Willfulness goes to the state of mind 13 of the person, and the element of reliance in your civil 14 fraud action is quite different than the element of 15 willfulness.

16 MS. CORWIN: Well, but I'm suggesting that in 17 this context of false statements a person's state of 18 mind would be affected by whether he expected that the 19 context in which he was speaking would induce someone 20 else to rely to their detriment or to give him a benefit 21 based on what he was saying.

22 I think the conversation with a neighbor is 23 one that you wash out with the willfulness requirement.
24 I would not that you would also wipe it out with the 25 "knew or should have known" expression, with that

1 instruction as well.

2 And I would suggest to Justice Stevens that I
3 think the question we presented in the petition, it 4 would be our position that that would be broad enough to 5 encompass that particular concern.

6 QUESTION: Let's just look at the question.
7 It says: "Whether, in a prosecution, the government
8 must prove that the defendant knew that the statement 9 was made in a federal matter." How does that raise the 10 instruction question?

11 MS. CORWIN: Well, I simply suggest that 12 perhaps in looking at what "knew" means in that 13 question, it may be appropriate to stop short of actual 14 knowledge if the Court concludes that our initial 15 position is incorrect. I don't want to dwell on that, 16 but I think it is simply our position that that would be 17 broad enough to raise it.

18 Respondent has noted the veto of the bill in 19 1934. I think that's significant. The veto was on the 20 ground, President Roosevelt said you haven't done 21 anything more in your attempted amendment here than is 22 on the books now, and besides, you've reduced the 23 penalties. Congress went back to the drawing board and,
24 I think, looked pretty carefully at the language it was 25 using when it then enacted the bill that became law.

1 And I would note again that there is -- while 2 Congress was clearly interested in reaching the problem
3 that was presented by the Cohn decision, the discussion
4 on the floor does not have -- or in committee, does not 5 relate, does not mention Cohn, and does not even frame
6 things in terms of monetary versus non-monetary interest 7 of the government.

8 The discussion was in terms of affording broad 9 protection to some pretty expansive programs and to 10 closing all the loopholes that had been creating these 11 practical problems for the government.

12 Respondent suggests that intermediary cases
13 are a new thing. I don't think that's so. I think even 14 if you look at the New Deal programs, they were using 15 state governments under the public works program to 16 administer some of those programs. And of course, you 17 always have the situation that was discussed earlier, in 18 which an employee forwards information to another 19 employee within the organization.

20 But the state cases call to mind the problems
21 that have arisen in the other cases that have raised 22 this issue, and that is the programs like Medicaid, in 23 which individuals make statements to state agencies that 24 are then forwarded to federal agencies and are the 25 purpose -- are the basis for providing federal funding.

1 It is not always easy to prove, in response to 2 Justice O'Connor's point, it is not always easy to prove 3 in that sort of program administered by states, that an 4 individual knew about the federal involvement.

5 Thank you.

6 CHIEF JUSTICE BURGER: Thank you, counsel.
7 The case is submitted.

8 (Whereupon, at 10:47 a.m., argument in the 9 above-entitled case was submitted.)
